PREFACE

WRITTEN during the war, these Studies grew out of the wish to impart some things I have enjoyed in Arabic and Persian not only to fellow-students, who can correct me if I misinterpret, but also to others who without being specialists are interested in the literature, philosophy and religion of the East. Since the five essays fall into two distinct groups, it has been decided to publish them in two volumes bearing different titles, namely, Studies in Islamic Poetry and Studies in Islamic Mysticism. The latter comprise (1) an account of the famous Persian Šúfí, Abú Sa'íd ibn Abi 'l-Khayr—dervish, abbot, saint, and reputed poet—drawn from documents singularly rich in detail which shed a rather disillusioning light upon his character; (2) a study of 'Abdu 'l-Karím al-Jílí's treatise entitled al-Insán al-Kámil or "The Perfect Man," a very curious exposition of the Mohammedan Logos doctrine by a Muḥyawí, i.e. one whose modes of thought are derived from Muḥyi'ddín Ibnu 'l-'Arabí; (3) an essay on the Odes of Ibnu 'l-Fárid, which unite mysticism with poetry of the rarest kind, but are so veiled in allegory that a glimpse of the meaning underneath is sometimes as much as we can obtain.

The present volume is devoted to belles-lettres. Professor Browne's edition of the Lubábu 'l-Albáb, the anthology compiled by Muḥammad 'Awfí, gave me an opportunity of trying what could be done with Persian court-poetry. In this field all the flowers are not roses, and the roses are artificial; yet with no disparagement to their beauty, so exquisite is the art. Abu 'l-'Alá al-Ma'arrí was an old friend, whose pessimism made hours of gloom seem cheerful by contrast; and I believed that many would appreciate a version of selected passages from his Luzúmiyyát. English readers have not yet had this work put before them in a recognisable form: they will see that it is not in the least like the "quatrains" which it has inspired. My essay should be read as a supplement to the monograph by Alfred von Kremer in the Proceedings of the Vienna Academy (1889). That, indeed, is worthy of its theme, and one can scarcely imagine that it will ever become obsolete. But with all its brilliancy and charm I doubt whether it does justice to Ma'arrí's genius. Von Kremer seems to have forgotten that poetry is not philosophy and that the Luzúm is pre-eminently the work of a literary man. His attention was fixed upon the ideas, consequently he did not examine the language and style with sufficient closeness to detect the subtle manner in which the poet at once disguises and proclaims his unbelief in the Mohammedan or any other revealed religion. I have broken new ground and endeavoured to widen the perspective. However my conclusions may be regarded, they are based on the best evidence, that of the author's writings, though it is avowedly disingenuous. Of the examples in English, including four which Mr Fisher Unwin has given me leave to reprint from my Literary History of the Arabs (1907), comparatively few coincide with the pieces chosen by Von Kremer. The appendix containing their text will serve, I hope, as an introduction to Arabic poetry for students who may find the pre-Islamic odes too difficult at first or fail to acquire a taste for them. Concerning the principles and methods which I have followed in translating, the choice of metres, the value of rhyme, etc., a good deal might be said; but as argument about such questions is apt to end in the sort of agreement recommended by Evenus—

σοὶ μὲν ταῦτα δοκοῦντ' ἔστω, ἐμοὶ δὲ τάδε—

it will be enough to say that the verse-translations are not unduly free and should be of use to readers of the original Arabic and Persian. While the mystical poems often need a commentary, in other cases the aim has been to select typical extracts which for the most part explain themselves.

I cannot send forth this book without some reference to what has helped me to write it. Thirty years have now passed since I began to read Persian with Professor E. G. Browne. Looking back over that period, I recall his constant sympathy, his ever ready encouragement and support, with feelings which are beyond my power to express. By dedicating these Studies to him I would pay tribute to a great Orientalist and more especially acknowledge, in a way that will not displease him, my personal debt of gratitude and affection.

P. 7. The name Abú Zurá'a is doubtful. See Ethé, Neupersische Literatur in Grundriss der Iranischen Philologie, vol. II. p. 221.

P. 10. I have retained the usual spelling of the name Rúdagí, but Rúdakí seems to be the correct form, as it rhymes with kúdakí in a verse by Nízámí 'Arúdí (Lubáb, vol. II. p. 7, l. 17) and with andakí in a verse by Kháqání (Jámí, Baháristán, ed. by Schlechta-Wssehrd, p. 95, l. 8 foll.).

P. 13. The flower which the Persians call lála (rendered here and elsewhere by "tulip") is really the red anemone.

P. 19. Jabal in connexion with 'Abdu 'l-Wási' refers to the mountainous district of Gharjístán. See Prof. Browne's Literary History of Persia, vol. II. p. 341, and Mr Le Strange's Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, pp. 415-6.

P. 56, l. 8 from foot. It ought perhaps to have been mentioned that here the Latin imitation is not quite exact. In the catalectic variety of the Ṭawíl metre the third foot of the second hemistich is regularly ~ ~ ~, and ~ ~ ~ occurs only as a rare exception to the rule. For this reason the "free" (muṭlaq) rhyme should be restored in the poem by Farazdaq printed in Nöldeke's Delectus, pp. 84-6. Perfect metrical correspondence might be obtained by writing in the second line of the Latin version habet testimonium hoc: grauis uia leti est,

بيع الشام. According to Muqaddasí, the Moslems turned half of the church into a mosque when they conquered Ḥims. Dr T. W. Arnold has called my attention to a passage in Ibn Jubayr (E. J. W. Gibb Memorial Series, vol. v. p. 303, 13-20) from which it appears that after mosques had been converted into churches, Moslems might continue to use a part of them. But these are doubtful examples of a practice which, in any case, was exceptional. Probably Ma'arrí is thinking of separate but adjacent buildings.

CHAPTER I

AN EARLY PERSIAN ANTHOLOGY

THE BOOK entitled Lubābu 'l-Albāb has been known to students of Persian literature since 1848, when an account of the Elliot Codex was communicated to the Royal Asiatic Society by Nathaniel Bland¹. Its importance and rarity—only two, or at most three, manuscripts have survived—marked it out for publication as soon as the long-delayed task of providing critical editions of historical and biographical Persian texts was taken in hand by Professor Browne with the energy and ardour to which Oriental scholarship owes so much; and it is now accessible in two volumes, admirably edited and artistically printed (Leyden, 1903–1906). Concerning the author, Muḥammad 'Awfī, we have little information. His family claimed descent from 'Abdu 'l-Raḥmān ibn 'Awf, an illustrious Companion of the Prophet. Born and bred at Bukhārā in the latter half of the twelfth century, 'Awfī became one of those wandering scholars who, obeying the Prophet's injunction to seek knowledge even in China, travelled from town to town and from court to court, and with nothing but their talents to recommend them played an influential part in Moslem politics and society. When Transoxania and Khurāsān were threatened by the Mongols, he made his way to India, where he served in succession under Sultan Nāṣiru'ddīn Qubācha of Sind and his conqueror, Sultan Iltatmish. To the vizier of Iltatmish he dedicated his most famous work, the Jawāmi'u 'l-Ḥikāyāt, an immense collection of historical and literary anecdotes.

The Lubāb professes to be the first Biography of Persian Poets, but although its form and arrangement justify this description, the so-called biographies chiefly consist of high-flown complimentary phrases strung together indiscriminately, with as little regard for fitness as for truth. Dates are very rare. In many cases the poet's name is the single fact that his "Life" yields, and we have reason to be thankful that the Moslem system of nomenclature often indicates the town or district to which a man belongs either by birth or residence. The Lubáb might safely be ignored if its value depended on the biographical notices written by 'Awfí himself. These, however, occupy an inconsiderable amount of space in relation to the whole text, which is almost entirely composed of excerpts from the work of about 300 poets. Essentially, then, the Lubáb is an anthology. It possesses unique historical importance as the oldest compilation of the kind in Persian¹, preserving the names of many ancient poets who are otherwise unknown, together with a great deal of verse that is nowhere else to be found. Of its literary merit lovers of poetry can form some notion from the specimens which I have translated, though this test is, of course, inadequate and must be corrected by reading the original passages as well as by reference to other portions of the book. Oriental standards of taste are so deeply at variance with those which prevail in Europe that we are too ready to condemn outright what displeases us instead of trying, not to reconcile the points of view, but to lay our own aside and approach the other in a spirit of sympathetic curiosity. This is the more necessary here because, with few exceptions, the poets cited in the Lubáb are distinctly minor and unable to rise above the elaborate conventions of the Persian ars poetica, which only the breath of genius can inspire with life. Moreover, in the opinion of an accomplished critic, Mírzá Muḥammad of Qazwín—whose introduction and notes to Professor Browne's edition are a model of patient and fruitful research—'Awfí has not selected the materials of his anthology to the best advantage.

Formally considered, Persian poetry falls into five main types, and four of these occur in the Lubáb, namely, the qaṣída or "purpose-poem," which is most often a panegyric but may be satirical, didactic, philosophical, or religious; the ghazal, of which the subject is usually love, human or divine; the qiṭ'a or fragment, which is either a piece of verse detached from a qaṣída or a poem complete in itself; and the rubá'i or quatrain. The fifth type, which is known by the name of maḥnawí, includes poems longer than the qaṣída, such as epics, romances, and expositions of moral or mystical philosophy. Both in form and motive it stands apart from the rest and offers no temptation to the ordinary anthologist.

Before discussing further these various kinds of poetry and showing some of their peculiar characteristics by means of translation, I think it may be well to say a few words on certain matters of historical interest about which the reader will naturally wish to be informed. Let me begin by setting forth 'Awfí's description of the contents of the Lubáb. He divides it into twelve chapters, arranged as follows:

- I. On the excellence of poetry and the poetic art.
- II. On the etymological meaning of shi'r (poetry).
- III. On the question who was the first poet.
- IV. On the question who was the author of the first Persian poem.
- V. On the choice poems of Sultans, Kings, and Amírs.
- VI. On the choice poems of viziers and eminent statesmen.
- VII. On the choice poems of religious leaders, divines, and men of learning.
- VIII. On the choice poems of the poets of the House of Ṭáhir, the House of Layth, and the House of Sámán.
- IX. On the poets of the House of Náṣir.
- X. On the poets of the House of Seljúq, to the end of the reign of Sanjar.
- XI. On the poets who flourished in the period extending from the death of Sanjar to the author's time.
- XII. On the choice poems of eminent statesmen, poets, and scholars attached to the court of Sultan Náṣiru'ddín Qubácha.

The introductory chapters need not detain us. As regards the questions propounded in chapters III and IV, 'Awfī is inclined to accept the tradition that the first poet in the world was Adam, who composed an Arabic elegy (two verses of which are quoted) on his son Abel; and he ascribes the first Persian verse to "that great Hunter," King Bahrām Gūr. Remembering that 'Awfī was a courtier, we can excuse him for giving royalties and grantees the place of honour in his Anthology, but it tries our patience to read those noble amateurs whom he flatters so cheaply. Of the verse in this section of the book a page or two would hold all that is worth preserving for its own sake or on account of its association with great personages and events. The eighth and following chapters, which are printed in the second volume of Professor Browne's edition, constitute the kernel of the Lubāb. Here we find real bards, men devoted to the art and business of poetry, drawn up, rank on rank, in the chronological order of the dynasties under which they lived: the Ṭāhirids (A.D. 820-872); the Ṣaffārids, descended from Ya'qūb ibn Layth, the Coppersmith (A.D. 867-903); the Sāmānids (A.D. 874-999); the Ghaznevids—called "the House of Nāṣir" after Nāṣiru'ddīn Sabuktigīn, who founded the dynasty—from the accession of Sultan Maḥmūd to the death of Mas'ūd, the third sovereign of the line (A.D. 998-1040); and finally the Seljūqs, from Ṭughril to Sanjar (A.D. 1037-1157), and from Sanjar to the author's day (about A.D. 1220). Thus the whole period covered by the Lubāb is approximately four hundred years. Opening with the spring-time of Persian poetry which accompanied the movement towards national independence in eastern Írán, it runs a long and brilliant course ere it closes amidst the gathering darkness of the Mongol invasion.

Since my object is not so much to trace the historical development of this poetry as to illustrate its literary form and substance, the work of individuals will receive less attention than the four principal types which have been enumerated above. I will treat each type separately, taking the simpler first and leaving the qaṣīda, the most artificial and complex, to the end.

The oldest Persian verse-form is probably the rubá'í. It contains four lines, of which the first, second, and fourth must rhyme with one another, while the third may or may not rhyme with the rest. Such an arrangement of rhymes, however, does not exhaust the definition: there must also be a certain metrical scheme. 'Awfí quotes two couplets by the Táhirid poet, Ḥanzala of Bádgḥís, which only fail to be a rubá'í because they are not written in one of the metres peculiar to this form:

My sweetheart rue-seed on the fire threw
 For fear of harm the evil eye might do.
 Rue-seed and fire she needs not, with a face
 As bright as fire, a mole as dark as rue¹.

The rubá'í resembles a short epigram, in the Greek sense of the word, and the best specimens have something of the quality which belongs to the Greek as contrasted with the Latin epigram: simplicity and directness of style, weight rather than wit, terseness without "epigrammatic" point. It was FitzGerald, not Omar Khayyam, who wrote,

For all the Sin wherewith the Face of Man
 Is blacken'd—Man's forgiveness give—and take!—

one of many instances in which the English version gives a new turn to the original. The rubá'í, again, is always a complete unit, unrelated to any larger whole. Persian literature furnishes no example of a poem like FitzGerald's, made up of a number of quatrains. In Persian Diwáns we often meet with collections of rubá'ís, but each one is absolutely independent, and its place in the series is determined by an external and fortuitous feature, namely, the alphabetical position of the letter that concludes the rhyme. There are no restrictions as to subject-matter. 'Awfí shows a marked preference for amatory rubá'ís, and we may presume that he knew what his readers liked. Among the chosen quatrains many are concerned with criticism of life in general or with topics suggested by a particular incident; others are descriptive, encomiastic, elegiac, satirical, moral, or religious. Noteworthy, as revealing the limitations of the Lubdb and its author, is the fact that the mystical rubá'i—and, I may add, mystical poetry of any kind—is scarcely represented at all. One must go elsewhere to learn how beautiful is the literature in which the deepest aspirations of Persian thought have expressed themselves.

I will now give some examples. The first two are by Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ṭalḥa, of whose poetry the greater part belonged to this genre. Skill in composing quatrains might make a poet celebrated, even if his more ambitious performances fell flat¹.

My heart that rested calm and free from care
Rose up when love of thee alighted there;
The hand that loosed the bonds of Fate and Time
Thy curl hath bound it with a single hair².

O well of honey! Yestereve thy sight
Gladdened this heart that cries for thee to-night.
'Tis a thing unimaginable, the tale
Of to-night's anguish, yestereve's delight³.

For thy love's sake I bled, and still implored in vain;
To patience then I fled, and still endured in vain.

There's no device on earth a desperate man can use
But I have used against thee, O Adored, in vain⁴.

(Táju'ddín Ismá'íl al-Bákhzarzí.)

Why do I hope, with empty words cajoled,
Since I nor head nor tail in it behold?

Guess by the Past what this New Year shall bring:
The New Year—and ten thousand sorrows old!⁵

(Táju'ddín Ismá'íl al-Bákhzarzí.)

Her beauty fills mine eye, and well must I agree
With mine own eye which holds my Sweetheart lovingly.

'Twixt eye and Sweetheart no right difference can be:
Either She takes eye's place, or eye is very She⁶.

(Rashídí of Samarcand.)

³ Ibid. II, 155, 7.

⁴ Ibid. II, 158, 2.

⁵ Ibid. II, 158, 10.

⁶ Ibid. II, 180, 16. This quatrain may be understood in a mystical sense.

Ah, my much love of thee hath laid me low,
Grief for thine absence bows me like a bow.

I have washed my hands of all thy tricks and wiles;
Lives there another who would treat me so?¹

(Abú Shukúr.)

The following rubá'i is evidently mystical.

Soul of the World, to Thee I turn again
With bleeding heart, and bring Thee all my pain.

Myself behind, before me need and woe,
And love still waxing—never may it wane!²

(Rafí' of Merv.)

When from her house the soul sets forth to climb
And hastens back to her eternal prime,

The four strings Nature fitted on Life's lute
Disorder'd break at the rude touch of Time³.

(Badí'u'ddín Turkú al-Sanjari.)

Long have I known the world and read its rede

In both extremes of fortune. 'Tis my creed,

Than wealth there's nothing better, next to faith,
As, next to unfaith, nothing worse than need⁴.

(Abú Zurá'a of Jurján.)

Here are two quatrains which have a topical character.
The first was composed by Rashídí of Samarcand, a panegyrist of Sultan Maliksháh.

Heav'n, which delight'st with contumely to brand

The wisest, how long will thy doomful hand

Plunge me in sadness? Oh, where shall I seek

The wind that blows me to sweet Samarcand?⁵

'Awfí relates that once he was in the company of a certain noble named Táju'ddín. A melon was brought in. Whilst Táju'ddín was helping himself to a slice, the knife slipped and cut his finger. The poet Sa'du'ddín Mas'úd Dawlatyár improvised this rubá'i:

Thy might o'ertops high Saturn's majesty,
 Thy bounty's wine makes avarice drunk with glee.
 Heav'n, plotting so that thou shouldst lavish less,
 Closed one full channel of thy fivefold sea¹.

The qiṭ'a (fragment) is properly a subdivision of the qaṣída, i.e. it consists of a number of verses removed from their context in the qaṣída of which they formed a part. Such excerpts have no claim to be treated as an independent poetical type. But the name is also given to any poem, complete in itself, that follows the qaṣída pattern in respect of the monorhyme (which characterises all types of Persian verse except the mathnawí), and cannot be classified either as a rubá'i or a ghazal, or included among the verse-forms of less importance. To the qiṭ'a, thus defined, all that has been said above concerning the varied subject-matter of the rubá'i is applicable, but the former, not being so narrowly restricted in length, affords larger opportunities both in the choice of a theme and in the way of handling it. More unconventional and spontaneous than the qaṣída and ghazal, this type comes nearer to our ideal of poetry. The difference appears most conspicuously in the oldest Persian verse produced under the Táhírids and their immediate successors. Of this only fragments survive², but they are enough to show that the first poets had not learned to use the style overloaded with ingenious rhetorical artifices, which makes the Lubáb such a tiresome book to read. Their language is generally plain and unaffected; in some pieces its simplicity is almost artless—

The cloud is weeping lover-like,
 The garden smiling as a bride;
 The thunder moaning, even as I
 Make bitter moan at morningtide³.

² This is not strictly accurate, if "fragment" is taken in its technical sense. The eighth chapter of the Lubáb contains one complete qaṣída as well as a few ghazals and rubá'is. All the remaining poems are qiṭ'as.

³ Lubáb, II. 4, 13.

The conceits in which the earliest poetry abounds are often so delicate and charming that it would be ungracious to accuse them of triviality. Besides, the criticism would not be just. Is anything really trivial that possesses artistic beauty? Ought we to despise Herrick's

Some ask'd me where the rubies grew,
And nothing did I say,
But with my finger pointed to The lips of Julia,

because it is only a pretty fancy? Those who are superior to such things will take no more interest in 'Awfi's anthology than in the Lyra Elegantiarum. In order that my readers may obtain a fair view of the first sprightly runnings of Persian lyric verse, I will depart for the moment from the plan adopted in this essay and try to render into English some representative examples which were composed during the ninth and tenth centuries (A.D. 826-999).

First, a few fragments on the subject of wine.

Choice wine, whose bitter strength can sweeten best
The embittered mind, and flood
The air with colour, as when goshawk's breast
Is dyed with pheasant's blood¹.

(Daqíqí.)

A composite whose body is of light,
But all its soul and spirit of fiery strain;
A star that hath its setting in the mouth,
But ever rises on the cheeks again².

(Daqíqí.)

Pour, boy, the vintage out
That oft my grief consoled,
That gushes from the flask
In new moon's crescent mould,
But in the cup appears
The moon a fortnight old!³

(Abú Shukúr.)

¹ Lubáb, II. 13, 7.

² Ibid. II. 13, 10.

³ Ibid. II. 21, 7.

Fetch me what first was like the eye, then came
 The vine-grower and seized its soul aflame.
 Let one drop trickle down to earth and roll,
 'Twould seem the blind man's eye, the dead man's soul¹.

(Abú Shukúr.)

Fire and water blent in one,
 'Twere a sight thou wouldst admire!
 Lo, the miracle is done:
 Yonder crystal cup, where gleams
 Wine of purest ruby, seems
 Water interfused with fire².

(‘Umára of Merv.)

The next piece is by the blind minstrel Rúdagí, the most famous poet of the Sámánid epoch.

Rúdagí the harp will play,
 'Gin ye the wine, as he the lay.
 Molten ruby or ruby wine,
 None who sees it may divine,
 Since Nature of one stuff did shape
 The solid gem, the liquid grape.
 Untouched, it stains the fingers red;
 Untasted, flies into the head³.

The following lines are less ancient, but were composed before A.D. 1050.

They drank of wine so pure and old,
 Its body seemed to be ensouled;
 And through them flowed that essence fine,
 As fire bright through coal doth shine⁴.

(Halíla.)

My last specimen of the wine-song is longer and more elaborate than any of these, and also differs from them all in having originally been the prelude of a qaṣída, as is shown by the double rhyme of the opening verse. The author, Kisá'í of Merv, was a well-known and singularly graceful poet who flourished in the latter half of the tenth century. I have attempted to imitate the *muḏārī*¹ metre in which the fragment is written.

Unclose thine eyes and deeply	gaze on the saffron-flower ¹
Shining amidst the grass-blades,	a very pearl in sheen,
Even as a shamefaced lover,	to hide his blushing cheeks,
Draws to his face the mantle	in folds of satin green.
The wine thro' darting sunbeams	how sweet and fair to see!
But oh, when falls reflected	therein the radiant shower,
The blue glass and red vintage	and golden-yellow rays
Are violet, you'd fancy,	and poppy and saffron-flower.
So bright 'tis, when it trickles	down from the goblet's mouth,
You'd say from pearls is trickling	cornelian red and fine;
So clear 'tis, when you pour it	in the hollow of your palm,
Nor palm from cup you ever	would know, nor cup from wine ² .

The same freshness and easy grace of style appears in the poems descriptive of love and beauty which have come down to us from that early time. Some of those translated below are properly ghazals, not qiṭ'as.

O would that in the world there were no night,
 That I might ne'er be parted from her lips!
 No scorpion-sting would sink deep in my heart
 But for her scorpion coils of darkest hair.
 If 'neath her lip no starry dimple shone,
 I would not linger with the stars till day;
 And if she were not cast in beauty's mould,
 My soul would not be moulded of her love.
 If I must live without my Well-belov'd,
 O God! I would there were no life for me³.

(Daqiqi.)

Abū Shu'ayb of Herát wrote the following verses on a Christian boy.

² Lubāb, II. 34, 20.

³ Ibid. II. 12, 11.

Faith-doomed to Hell, his form and face of Paradise,
 With fawn's eyes, curly tresses, tulip cheeks.
 A lip as when from Chinese painter's brush
 O'er vermeil oozes the long silver line.
 Should he bestow his beauty on the Ethiop,
 The Ethiop would be envied by the Turk¹.

The tulips of thy cheek, when thou unveil'st,
 Abash the Sun: behind the veil he hies.
 If the apple hath a mole of musky grain,
 That chin of thine's an apple every wise².

(Rúdagí.)

Here are three couplets from a ghazal composed by Júybárí, a poet of Bukhárá, who was a goldsmith and expert in his craft. The original metre is imitated.

That idol fair, whose kisses	are balm to the broken-hearted,
Alas, she still denies me	the balm that heals my sorrow.
Now I, for love's sake weeping,	an April cloud resemble.
'Tis well: the cloud of April	works miracles of beauty.
At dawn above the garden	it passed, and in a moment
Emparadised with roses	from end to end the garden ³ .

Those jet curls clustered on her silver brow—
 A swarm of negroes Baghdád plundering!
 That cheek on which falls rippling one black tress,
 You'd say 'tis fire fanned by raven's wing⁴.

(Muḥammad ibn Šáliḥ al-Walwálají.)

Those curls the wind is tossing to and fro
 Are like a restless lover; nay, the hand
 Of warring Emperor's chamberlain that waves
 From the far tent, "To-day no audience here!"⁵

(Khabbázi of Nishápúr.)

Beauty's queen by lovers guarded,
 You whose cheeks the moon doth glass,
 Where you glance, narcissus blooming;
 The moon rising, where you pass!

³ Ibid. II. 11, 10.

⁴ Ibid. II. 22, 15.

⁵ Ibid. II. 27, 19.

Oh, your face and hair—the fairest
 Book of white and black is this!
 Cheek and tress are sin and penance,
 Lip and eye are bale and bliss¹. (Kisá'í.)

The objective and pictorial character which the reader will doubtless have remarked in the poems inspired by love and wine is still more conspicuous in the pieces describing Nature. Seldom in either case do we find any intimacy of passion, any depth of moral or spiritual emotion. These lyrics express the keen sensuous feeling of the poet, his joy in visible and material things and his grief at their loss, but they express it objectively so far as the feeling itself becomes subordinate to the fanciful imagery in which it is clothed. Many of the poems on spring and the beauty of spring flowers are little idylls, exquisite of their kind. I will first quote two descriptions of stormy weather about the time of the Persian New Year.

The world with snow was silvered for a season,
 But emerald came instead of the heaps of silver.
 The rich pagoda of Cashmere at springtide
 Surrendered to the garden all its pictures.
 See how the lake's whole surface by the March wind
 Is raised, like sturgeon's back, in scaly ridges!²
 ('Umára of Merv.)

Lashed by gusts the leafy willows
 Are as drunkards reeling headlong.
 Watch the crimson tulips waving
 Bloodied sword-points in the dawn!³
 ('Umára of Merv.)

Of all the innumerable tributes which Persian poets have offered to the rose, I know of none so charming as these lines by Kisá'í:

Roses are a gift of price
 Sent to us from Paradise;
 More divine our nature grows
 In the Eden of the rose.

² Ibid., II. 24, 21.

³ Ibid., II. 25, 17.

Roses why for silver sell?
 O rose-merchant, fairly tell
 What you buy instead of those
 That is costlier than the rose¹.

Here are two fragments:

See the rose, its pearly whiteness
 Overblushed with pure cornelian,
 Like the wedding-day of lovers
 Sleeping, cheek on cheek laid softly².

(Manjik.)

Behold the red rose, not yet fully blown—
 A dainty fondling worshipping her idol,
 Or like the loved one's lips, red, small, and close
 When she looks up to meet her lover's kiss³.

(Kawkabí of Merv.)

Even in their laudatory verses the diction of these poets is plain and direct. Being Persians and courtiers, they do not measure their compliments by the merit of their patrons, but if they are not sincere, they at least seem so—an illusion which is no longer possible when the art of exaggeration has hardened into an obviously rhetorical exercise. The following lines by Faḍl ibn 'Abbás al-Rabījaní lament the death of the Sámánid prince, Naṣr ibn Aḥmad, and celebrate the accession of Núḥ ibn Maṣṣúr.

A prince hath passed of noble race,
 A prince high-born hath ta'en his place.
 Time mourns for him that passed away,
 For him that's crowned the world is gay.
 Look now with reason's eye and tell
 How just is God in what befell!
 For if one Light from us He reft,
 Another in its place He left;
 If Saturn rose with baleful power,
 Yet soon returned Jove's gracious hour⁴.

² Ibid. II. 14, 24.

³ Ibid. II. 65, 13.

⁴ Ibid. II. 9, 22.

The next examples take a more personal tone and are marked by greater finish of style.

To ward the kingdom, Fortune took thy sword,
And Bounty chose thy hand, herself to ward.
In Heav'n for thy decree Fate listening stands,
The *dínár*¹ from its ore sets out to win thy hands².

(Daqíqí.)

Tho' such thine art to paint and skill to sing,
That none but thee should dare lift up his head,
Thy proper qualities thou canst not sing,
The portrait of thyself thou canst not paint³.

(Kisá'í.)

Firdawsí extols the munificence and bravery of Sultan Maḥmúd in four lines which are worth many bombastic qaṣídas:

I see thou holdest cheap two things
That are held dear by other kings:
Gold, when thy head doth wear the crown;
Life, when thou putt'st the helmet on⁴.

The following qiṭ'as belong to different periods and illustrate the wide range of subject permitted to poems of this type.

Besides the few lines which I have just quoted, the only specimen preserved by 'Awfí of Firdawsí's lyrical verse is a fragment in which the aged poet looks back upon long years of ill-rewarded toil when he was engaged in gathering materials for his Sháhnáma.

Much have I laboured, much read o'er
Of Arabic and Persian lore,
Collecting tales unknown and known;
Now two and sixty years are flown.
Regret, and deeper woe of sin,
'Tis all that youth has ended in,
And I with mournful thoughts rehearse
Bú Táhir Khusrawání's verse:
"I mind me of my youth and sigh,
Alas for youth, for youth gone by!"⁵

³ Ibid. II. 37, 16.

⁴ Ibid. II. 33, 12.

⁵ Ibid. II. 33, 15.

Many qiṭ'as are what the French call vers d'occasion in the sense that their subject or motive is supplied by some circumstance of passing interest. The poet Farrukhí, a contemporary of Firdawsí at the court of Ghazna, having amassed a large fortune, set out on a pleasure-trip to Samarcand. He had nearly reached his journey's end when he was attacked by brigands, who carried off the whole of his wealth. Being penniless and without resources, he did not venture to show himself in Samarcand, and after a few days returned home, leaving as a memorial of his visit the following lines:

Before me lay the riches
Of lordly Samarcand,
I looked o'er grove and garden,
O'er vale and meadow-land.

But since my purse was empty,
My pocket bare as thread,
The rug of joy I folded,
From the hall of hope I fled.

I had heard in every city
Famed scholars oft declare,
"Eight are the Paradises,
And but one Kawthar there."¹

Here bloom a thousand Edens,
A thousand Kawthars foam,
But ah me! what avail they,
Since I go thirsty home?

When hand a dirhem lacketh
Whilst eye sees all its wish,
'Tis like a head dis severed
Within a golden dish².

Although in his earlier poems Farrukhí cultivated a subtle and artificial style, he finally sought and attained the ease that "comes by art, not chance"; and this manner of writing (sahl-i mumtani') distinguishes the pieces by which he is represented in the Lubáb. Here is the prelude of a qaşıda addressed to Sultan Maḥmúd:

¹ Kawthar is the name of a river in Paradise, "whiter than milk and sweeter than honey."

² Lubáb, II. 48, 1.

I said, "O Sun of beauty, kiss me thrice!"
 Said she, "The sun in this world no lips touch."
 I said, "A new world for a kiss! Too much."
 Said she, "Thou canst not cheapen Paradise."
 Said I, "Thy stature tall hath bended me."
 "The arrow companies the bow," said she.
 "Dew of mine eyes hath freshed thy face," I said.
 Said she, "Water keeps gardens fresh and fine."
 I said, "On thy bright cheek shall I lay mine?"
 Said she, "No, no: thy yellow¹ will dull my red."
 Said I, "Thine absence, Dear, hath agèd me."
 "Grow young in service of the King," said she².

The author of the next two pieces is Anwarí, the most renowned of the Seljúq court-poets, who died circa A.D. 1190.

O mighty Prince, whose majesty sublime
 Scarce deigns to mount the piebald steed of Time;
 Whose judgment hits the mark of empire high,
 As 'twere an arrow quivered in the Sky—
 To-day hath Heav'n arrayed his cloudy throne,
 The wind shoots keener shafts than Árish's own³;
 On every mountain-angle snowflakes star
 The landscape, like a jewelled scimitar.

And I have graced my song, as well I may,
 With the sweet prelude of another's lay.
 For whosoe'er of such a day hath sight,
 (Now chiefly when the tangled locks of Night Fall thickest) to his mind will come the line,
 "To-day's the day for tent and fire and wine."⁴
 The Nine Spheres' influence keep thee safe and fast,
 While the Four Elements and Six Directions last!⁵

² Lubáb, II. 49, 13. Three verses are omitted in the translation.

³ Árish was a Persian knight renowned for his skill with the bow.

⁴ I have not been able to discover the author of this line.

⁵ Lubáb, II. 137, 10.

Anwarī does not disguise his contempt for the art of poetry as practised by the professional qaṣīda-writers amongst whom he had reluctantly enrolled himself. It was a choice of evils, and he resolved to be a rich poet rather than a poor scholar. Towards the end of his life, however, as the following lines testify, he shook off the galling and debasing fetters to which long years of court-patronage had not inured him, and found happiness where his own tastes pointed it out—in solitude, and quiet study, secretum iter et fallentis semita uitae.

Yesterday a dear one asked me, "Will you sing of love again?"
Nay, I have done with poetising, fallen from my hand the pen.
Long in error's way I chanted lofty praise and satire stern,
Now those days are gone behind me—vanished never to return.
Love-lay, panegyric, satire, I was making all the three—
Why? Because lust, greed, and anger dwelt unitedly in me:
Lust the livelong night tormenting evermore my sleepless brain
To describe a ringlet's crescent and a lip like sugar-cane;
Greed all day in tribulation pondering o'er a scrap of verse
Where, from whom, and how five dirhems might be coaxed into my purse;

Anger, like a wounded mongrel, solace for his smart would fetch,
Tooth and claw in sullen fury turning on some weaker wretch.
Since the grace of God Almighty shown unto His helpless thrall Hath unchained me from those harpies—so may He release you all!—

Love-lay, panegyric, satire shall I make now? Heav'n forbend!
I have wronged enough already soul and mind: 'tis time to mend.
Anwarī, beware of boasting!—Honour lays on that a ban—
But when once thy word is plighted, see thou keep it like a man.
From the busy world retired dwell and seek the way that saves!
Very soon the last goes o'er thee of thy life-tide's ebbing waves¹.

When Anwarī condemns "boasting" as ungentlemanly, he means, of course, loud and vain words promising deeds that are never performed. Amongst Moslems, boasting of another sort is a traditional prerogative of the poet, handed down from pre-Islamic days when the Bedouin bards in glorifying themselves did honour to the tribe of which they were the foremost champions and spokesmen. Persian fakhr has no such narrow but intense background of patriotism to relieve its extravagance: it is frankly personal, as in the shorter of the two specimens translated below, which was composed by a minstrel of the Sámánid age, while in the minor poets of the succeeding periods it is often distinguished from vulgar self-advertisement only by its literary flavour and the fantastic heights of hyperbole to which it soars.

When silver they ask of me, gold I fling;
The power of my song, when they bid me sing,
Makes wax of stubborn steel.
When the wind's abroad, with the wind I roam:
Now with cup and lute I leave my home,
Now armed from head to heel¹.

(Abú Zurá'a of Jurján.)

The following version retains the monorhyme:

I am he who bore the flag of knowledge through the universe,
From the Pleiads' angle down to Earth's deep centre, everywhere.
With my strength of understanding Mars himself in vain would cope;
Matched with my keen flame of wit the Sun's own rays are dull and rare.
Monarchs boast that I have sung for them and praised them in my song,
Schoolmen vow my lore and learning is a model past compare.
Robed in loveliness at all times is my genius, like the sky;
Pure and undefiled my poesy at all times, like the air.
Of my genius evidence enow my style and diction bring,
To my poesy an ample witness my ideas bear².

(‘Abdu ‘l-Wási’ of Jabal.)

This qif’a by Rúhí shows that a reputation for satirical pleasantry might be embarrassing to its owner.

¹ Lubáḥ, II. 10, 13.

² Ibid. II. 108, 13.

To-day, when like a donkey from his meal
 Driv'n off, I know what Fortune's outcasts feel,
 Some evil-minded and suspicious men
 Call satire every eulogy I pen.
 If I but breathe a prayer to God on high,
 "This fellow is reviling us," they cry¹.

Abú Ṭāhir al-Khusrawání, one of whose verses had the luck to be quoted in a poem of Firdawsí, said in the course of a qaṣída composed when he was suffering from a mortal disease:

I baffled four professions; in despair
 They left me, and I see no symptom yet
 Of cure by doctor's drug, ascetic's prayer,
 Stargazer's fortune, sorcerer's amulet².

During the middle Seljúc period the people of Tirmidh groaned under the oppression inflicted on them by a tyrannous governor, named Akhtí; and as 'Awfí puts it, "so many pregnant sighs ascended to Heaven that at last the angels charged themselves with the task of fulfilling the prayers of his victims." One day, while carousing, he swallowed a deep draught of wine, some of which "stuck in his throat" and choked him to death. The poet Adíb-i Šábir wrote this qit'a by way of epitaph:

Straight from the feast, Akhtí, you went to Hell—
 A hundred thousand blessings light upon that day of revel!
 Since you departed, all the world is well.
 May God have mercy on your death, tho' you are with the Devil!³

Most of the elegiac pieces in 'Awfí's collection seem to us superficial in feeling and undignified in expression. We find it hard to imagine that true affection and tender sorrow can indulge in pretty (and even witty) conceits, but there have been epochs in English literature when this combination did not appear so incongruous as it does now. If we remember that contemporary taste allowed Donne to conclude his "Elegy on the Lord C." with the couplet:

² Ibíd. II. 20, 15.

³ Ibíd. II. 123, 20.

Here needs no marble tomb, since he is gone;
He, and about him his, are turn'd to stone—

we shall be less disposed to ridicule Kisá'í for writing on the death of a certain notable of Merv:

I know not what strange hap thy funeral was,
That bathed bright eyes in dew, torn cheeks in blood.
All Merv became a Flood of tears for thee,
Thy coffin was the Ark upon the Flood¹.

Adíb-i Šábir, who has been mentioned above, wrote the following elegy on his mistress. The English rendering imitates the Persian monorhyme.

My sweetheart went to yonder world, to see amongst the houris
there
If she might find for loveliness her parallel in yonder world.
Rizwán unbarr'd the gate for her, because her hair's dark violet
And bosom's jessamine adorned no damozel in yonder world.
How all the pains and agonies of earth and heaven do load my heart,
Since I am lingering here, but she is gone to dwell in yonder world!²

Beside this piece may be set the lines attributed to Sultan Maḥmúd of Ghazna on the death of a slave-girl to whom he was fondly attached.

O Moon! since thou in earth entombed dost lie,
I love earth more than sky.
"Patience!" to my despairing heart I said,
"God's fate is justly sped.
Of earth was Adam; and his children all Return, like him, to their original."³

Rúdagí's lament for the poet Abu 'l-Ḥasan Murádí of Bukhárá, which is among the first elegies written in Persian, has an austere dignity of its own.

² Ibid. II. 124, 9.

³ Ibid. I. 24, 23.

Murádí dead!—meseems, he hath not died;
 The death of such a Master is no light thing.
 His dear soul to the Father he gave back,
 To the Mother his dark body he resigned¹.

Unlike the qit'a, which lends itself to every conceivable topic and occasion, the ghazal is pre-eminently, though not exclusively, consecrated to Love. Shorter than the qaṣída, but otherwise resembling it in form, it differs from it—and from the qit'a also—in having less continuity and a looser connexion of ideas. The treatment of the subject is extremely conventional, and there are other features which not only make the ghazal unpleasing to modern taste but force the translator either to select with caution or run the risk of shocking his readers. We meet with the same difficulty in Greek literature: it will be enough to recall the names of Plato and Strato. As regards Persian poetry, this aspect of love is prominent in the lyrics, while in epic and romantic verse the normal relations of men and women are depicted. Many ghazals contain nothing to indicate the sex of the person addressed, an ambiguity which is favoured by the fact that Persian has no grammatical gender; and even when it is certain that the charms of a youth are celebrated, as in the first of the following specimens, one can scarcely feel the subject to be offensive, so fanciful and remote from actuality is the style.

¹ Lubáb, II. 8, 3. These lines are imitated by Jalálu'ddín Rúmi in his ode on the death of Saná'í, beginning:

Quoth some one, "Master Saná'í is dead."
 The death of such a Master is no little thing.

See text and translation in my Selected Poems from the Diwán-i Shams-i Tabriz, No. xxii. p. 86. Jalálu'ddín's version of Rúdagi's second couplet is,

The earthly frame he flung to earth,
 Soul and intellect he bore to heaven.

According to the theory of Moslem natural philosophers, it is the influence of the Planets (the Seven Fathers) acting upon the Elements (the Four Mothers) that produces the ever changing forms of life in the sub-lunary world. By the metaphysicians, however, this function is assigned to the Active Intelligence (intellectus agens, the νοῦς ποιητικός of Aristotle), which is probably "the Father" in Rúdagi's verse.

O thou whose cheeks are the Pleiades and whose lips are coral, Thy Pleiades are the torment of the heart, thy coral is the food of the soul.

In chase of those Pleiades my back hath become like the sky¹,
For love of that coral my eyes have become like the sea.

Methinks, thy down is a smoke thro' which are seen rose-leaves,
Methinks, thy tresses are a cloud in which is hidden the sun—
A smoke that hath set my stack on fire,
A cloud that hath loosed from mine eyes the rain.

Thine eye, by wounding my heart, hath made me helpless;
Thy tress, by ravishing my soul, hath made me distraught.
If thine eye pierces my heart, 'tis right, for thou art my sweetheart;
And if thy tress ravishes my soul, 'tis fair, for thou art my soul's desire.

In peace, the banquet-hall without thy countenance is not lighted;
In war, the battle-field without thy stature is not arrayed.
The banquet-hall without thy countenance is the sky without the moon;
The battle-field without thy stature is the garden without the cypress.

My body is in pain from thine eye full of enchantments,
My heart is in sorrow from thy tresses full of guile—
A pain that thy sight turns in a moment to pleasure,
A sorrow that thy speech turns in an instant to joy.

Thy face is a tulip for delicacy and pinkness,
Thy teeth are pearls for brightness and purity.
I never heard of pearls in honey-laden coral,
I never heard of tulips amidst musk-shedding hyacinths².

(Mu'izzí.)

Since Mu'izzí, who died about 1150, was an original writer and seems entitled to the distinction of having first developed the characteristic Persici apparatus of courtpoetry, I will translate another ghazal by him, reproducing the metre as far as is possible in English.

If my Belov'd—fair picture!— My passion's grief and sorrow And if her glance tale-telling From all the world my secret 'Twould seem as though I dwelt in If now and then my Sweetheart O that my food were made of That o'er her in requital And O that she would never That with her cheeks my banquet	deigned but to look upon me, were not so sore a burden; had not revealed her secret, would have been hidden always. a Paradise of gladness, along the road were passing. her lips' twin rubies only, mine eye might shed its rubies! my banquet leave behind her, might glow like beds of tulips!¹

These poems, with their naive parallelisms and decorative metaphors, have an elegance and ease of expression that deserve to be admired. But though Persian amatory verse is seldom deficient in beauty of form, those who are most familiar with it will confess that, as a whole, it suggests "the little emptiness of love" rather than la grande passion. There are important exceptions, e.g., the semi-mystical odes in which Love has become a religion and the worship of human beauty is subtly mingled with raptures of divine enthusiasm. In the Lubáb, however, this high note is only heard at long intervals, and then imperfectly. The fashionable love-lyric runs in a narrow mould which very few Moslem poets have dared to break. Like medieval Minnesong, it is artificial and monotonous in phrase, and its sentiment (which may be quite genuine) leaves us unmoved. I do not think it is chance that the following lines—an almost unique outburst of passionate feeling—were written by a woman, Rábi'a, the daughter of Ka'b.

This is my curse on thee. God send thou love
 One like thyself, unkind and obdurate,
 That knowing Love's deep cautery thou mayst writhe
 In loneliness, and know my worth too late!²

Rábi'a was nicknamed "the Brazen Fly"—a phrase which occurs in one of her poems. An accomplished hetaera, docta sermones utriusque linguae, she wrote verse in Arabic as well as in Persian.

² Ibid. II. 62, 14.

I will now translate a few short ghazals by different hands. They have been chosen for their simplicity and comparative lack of rhetorical ornaments.

All busy selfishness from mind I banished
When first I played with thee in love's sweet strife;
Ready was I and ripe for death the instant
I clasped thee to my bosom close as life.

Oh, many a night I threatened thee with parting,
But when day came I fell in love once more.
In vain I pleaded, for thou wouldst not listen;
I found thee deaf and ran towards the door.

The tree of bliss I planted in love's garden,
The fruit it bore was absence and regret¹.
Have I forgotten thee, as thou pretendest?
Nay, 'tis most false. God knows if I forget!²

(Samá'í of Merv.)

My sweetheart keeps not any touch of kindness,
The only craft she knows is—to be cruel.
Her beauteous face, you dare not look upon it;
Scornful she moves away, a stately cypress.
When I speak words of love, she makes no answer:
All her delight is holy vows and prayers.
Oh, what a smiling aspect wears the lover
Who courts a mistress, not a sainted vestal!
Buy with my soul a kiss from her I will not,
And well I know she is not fond of giving.
Her kisses must be bought with very life-blood,
She hath no kisses that are purchased cheaply³.

(Samá'í of Merv.)

Until I know my Fair is mine,
My budded hopes will never bloom,
For I must languish and repine
Till she into my arms is come.

 And life is but a dead leaf's swirl
 Till close I hold her to my breast.

For thy sake life and youth were dear;
 Now, without thee, I wish them gone.
 The day I dreamed should send thee here,
 Alas! that day will never dawn¹.

(Táju'ddín Ismá'íl al-Bákhharzí.)

Thou who didst leave thy lover most innocent forsaken,
 From thee despite I suffer, friends eye me with suspicion.
 If 'tis a crime to love thee, that crime have I committed;
 Yet for this cause no lover, I trow, was e'er forsaken.
 The crime that was thy doing I took upon my shoulders,
 In vain I strove and struggled—what helps a thing down-trodden?
 Thou keep'st me late and early in mourning for thine absence²,
 Mine eyes with blood bedabbled, my raiment torn to pieces.
 To hear against thy lover the words of those who hate him,
 Oh, 'tis a crime notorious in gentlefolk's opinion³.

(Sayfí of Nishápúr.)

O thou by whose fair face my life is led,
 One day with thee is joy that never dies.
 Without thy favour no desire is fed,
 Without thy beauty no delight can rise.
 Thy face forgetting, if one breath I take,
 That breath I count not of my life a part.
 Thine absence wrings my inmost heart with ache,
 O joy and health and ache of my inmost heart!
 Say once, "My lover is my slave," that Fame
 May know me when thou call'st me by this name!⁴

(Rafí' of Merv.)

The roses of thy cheeks at last will fade and languish,
 At last this lovelorn heart will throb no more in anguish.
 Why buildest thou so much on fortune's passing favour?
 Ere long thy sun will set and disappear for ever.

(Rafi' of Merv.)

The following ghazal is purely mystical. Its author, Fakhru'ddīn Mas'ūdī of Merv, was not a professional poet, but a famous scholar and theologian. His biography, therefore, belongs to the first volume of the Lubāb, but 'Awfī having inadvertently omitted it in its proper place has inserted it in the second part of his work.

Deep in the desert of Thy love uncrossed
 Wander like me a thousand wretches lost.
 Love to their anguish myriad guises lends,
 Anguish their souls in myriad pieces rends.
 Thy beauty is the medicine of their care,
 Union with Thee their hope that kills despair.
 Unless with loving hand Thou lead them on,
 Their souls will go the way their hearts have gone.
 Where Thou art throned above our human fate,
 Fraud and religion bear an equal rate²;
 Milk of Thy grace the wise old man, world-soiled,

The qaṣīda is the consummate type of Persian court-poetry, and in accordance with that definition its primary motive is praise, which might more accurately be termed flattery, of the great. Since no bard who knew his business could afford to economise in compliments, the qaṣīda is generally a long poem, ranging from twenty or thirty to well over a hundred couplets.

Whatever metre be chosen, the rhyme-system is invariable. The opening couplet always has two rhymes, one in each hemistich, and the same rhyme is repeated at the end of every succeeding couplet until the poem is finished. To write a full-length qaṣīda under such conditions, without injuring the artistic effect, demands great skill; in English, where rhymes are much scarcer, it could not be done except as a tour de force. For the sake of those who do not read Persian I translate a few couplets in order to show how the exordium of a qaṣīda is rhymed.

O heart, bring the good news! She I love best is coming.
 O eye, prepare the lodging, for thy guest is coming.
 O body, though love hath brought thee to thy latest breath,
 Yet forward send thy soul! She of thy quest is coming.
 Now once again make merry with new glee: the end
 Of absence long that burns the aching breast is coming.
 The days of grief and woe and anguish—all are past;
 The hour of peace and joy and balmful rest is coming¹.

Here each couplet (there are fifteen in the original) ends with the words hamī rasad, "is coming," which constitute what is called the radif, while the rhyme proper is formed by the syllable immediately preceding it.

I have said that the qaṣīda is properly a panegyric; and this statement, though by no means of universal application, holds good in regard to most of the qaṣīdas quoted in the Lubāb. If they had contained nothing else than flattery of kings and nobles, they would have been insufferably tedious to us, and perhaps even to those eminent persons whose munificence they were designed to stimulate. Sa'dī, in the *Galistān*², tells a story about some dervishes with whom he consorted. They enjoyed a regular allowance from a certain grandee, but in consequence of an act committed by one of them he withdrew his patronage. Sa'dī resolved to intercede on his friends' behalf. He paid a visit to the great man, who received him with marks of honour and esteem. "I sat down," he says, "and conversed on every topic until the subject of my friends' offence came up"; and he goes on to relate how he gained his end. The structure of the qaṣīda exemplifies this rule of courtly etiquette. Instead of coming straight to the point (which is, in plain terms, to give praise in hope of getting a reward), the poet begins his ode with an elaborate description of a handsome youth or a beautiful garden or some equally irrelevant topic; and having thus won the ear of his prospective patron, he glides as dexterously as he can from the exordium (nasīb) into the encomium (madiḥ). Although the two have no real connexion with each other, so that the qaṣīda lacks organic unity, the whole poem is endowed with unity of purpose, inasmuch as the prelude contributes to the success of the panegyric and aims indirectly at bringing about the same result.

"Some excellent authorities have said that the nasīb is a ghazal with which the poet, according to convention, introduces his principal theme, in order that, by reason of the fondness that most men have for hearing the various emotions of the lover and the beloved and their mutual dalliance described, the person to whom the poem is addressed may listen attentively and divert his thoughts from other cares; and in order that he may be led by this means to apprehend the main purpose of the qaṣīda with a collected mind and a calm soul, and bestow on it a greater measure of approbation. Anwarī says:

She came to me at day-rise,	the Sun amongst the fair,
Her figure a tall cypress,	her cheek a bright full-moon.
Her ruby lip was setting	on fire a thousand souls,
Her ringlet's tip was leading	in chains a thousand hearts.
Against the souls in ambush	her locks had loosed their might;
Her amorous glance an arrow,	poised on the eyebrow's bow ¹ ."

Whereas in the encomium the poet is a slave to his profession, the nasīb gives him an opportunity of displaying his powers on a subject that does not constrain him to use fine rhetoric or fulsome adulation. In this part of the qaṣīda we sometimes chance on passages of fresh and opulent beauty or tinged with a maturer charm of melancholy, which bid us pause when we are tempted to cry out that these Oriental Pindars are unreadable. The few versions given here show that love, though it is a favourite subject of the nasīb, is not the only one, as the words quoted from Shams-i Qays suggest.

¹ The Mu'jam of Shams-i Qays, ed. by Mīrzā Muḥammad and E. G. Browne (E. J. W. Gibb Memorial Series, vol. x.), 383, 19.

When from the night's dark rising	a little space had past,
That beauty springlike-joyous	into the garden came—
Her loveliness so tender,	peris would worship it;
Before her jewelled splendour	idols would kiss the earth.
The treasurer of Glory	she robbed of his guarded grace,
From the fair maids of Khoten	she bore the palm away—
And whispering softly, softly,	spake to me: "Why," said she,
"Why art thou fain to leave me?"	What is this purpose fell?
Ah, stay, for here beside me	spring reigns in autumn's stead;
My cheeks are damask roses,	my chin a white lily.
And rest thine eye on the wine-cup,	then wilt thou praise no more
The tulip's rain-washed petals,	the dew-bright jessamine." ¹

(Masrūr ibn Muḥammad of Ṭāliqān.)

The poet, of course, remains deaf to her appeal and pursues his journey to the vizier whose patronage he was seeking.

In the following exordium 'Unṣurī describes the battle-field of Sultan Maḥmūd.

A scene like Paradise! 'Tis not Farkhār²,
 Yet all the splendour of Farkhār is there.
 Kisses of loyal kings imprint the earth,
 Faces of fair youths fill with light the air.
 Then look how gold and silver Pleiades
 Bestud the rolling sky of scimitars,
 And how, like dagger's pearl-encrusted haft,
 Each baldrick shows its blazonry of stars!
 Mark yonder troop belted with golden swords,
 Whereon pomegranate-red you may behold
 Rubies like tears of blood distilled in pain
 From lover's eyes o'er cheeks as pale as gold.
 On the ranked elephants their golden harness
 Glitters like saffron flowers on some hillside;
 Serpents their trunks might seem: in such a coat
 Of golden scales the serpent's self doth glide.
 Darkful as thunderclouds, with dagger-tusks,
 Their mountain-forms move wind-like o'er the plain.
 What place is this? The battle-field, in sooth,
 Of the world's Emperor and Suzerain!³

Anwarí, as we have seen, was far from happy in his profession. These opening lines of one of his most celebrated qaşídas were, no doubt, inspired by the conflict of the better which he saw and approved with the worse which he followed.

Unless Fate rules the course of life entire,
Why fall things not according to desire?
To good or evil, as Fate pulls the rein,
So runs the world; and all is planned in vain.

Day after day a thousand pictures pass,
But never Truth appears in Fancy's glass.
"How? Why?" The Painter of these changing scenes,
He works without a cause, without a means.

Our hands are impotent to loose or bind,
Life's joy and sorrow let us meet resigned.
Beneath yon sky-blue dome our earthly state
Hangs on the order of celestial Fate.

O Time, great lord of Nature! since by thee
My body natural is held in fee,
Why with such eager spite dost thou devise,
Most ancient humpback! torments for the wise?

No mind can reach thy revolution's cause,
No eye discover thy mysterious laws.
From thy dark wheels what anguish o'er me fell,
Ah! 'tis a plaint would take long years to tell¹.

Very often the nasíb is a description of the coming of Spring, a season which the poets associate with wine-drinking amidst flowers and with all sorts of festivity.

O paradisal beauty!	come, fetch the cup of wine.
Sweet April hath apparelled	the world like Paradise.
The field flings down a carpet	of pictured tapestry,

A satin-woven carpet	mountain and meadow-land :
This like a Chinese temple,	splendid with China's art,
That like the house of Mání ² ,	with lovely paintings hung.
Lo, there the rich tiara	of gems on the jasmine-bough !
See how the queenly roses	unfold their broideries !
Roses like cheeks of houris,	laden with spicy curls ;
Jasmines like lawns of Eden,	fragrant and beautiful.
As 'twere a bride, the rosebush	arrays herself ; the cloud
Tirewoman-like is laving	the dust and grime away,
Now round her neck arranging	a string of pearly tears,
Now drawing o'er her blushes	a veil of gauzy mist.
Those tulips, where the cloud's eye	hath hid its weeping showers,
Well might'st thou call them flagons	of onyx filled with wine,
Or flashes of keen fire	in water, or bright waves
Of Badakhshání ruby	tossing in seas of Spring ³ .
	('Am'aq of Bukhárá.)

Such passages—and there are many of equal or superior merit—redeem the courtly qaṣida from utter barrenness. Artificial as they are, they are not consciously insincere, and one can admire the workmanship without feeling that all beneath is tainted. This saving clause does not extend to the panegyric. Here the moral character and motive of the poet inevitably come into view ; nor is there any pretence of disguising them. The Amír of Khurásán asked the minstrel Abú Zurá'a, "Can you make poetry like Rúdagí?" "My poetry is better than his," he replied, "but it needs thy bounty, for a poet becomes popular only when his patron regards him with favour"; then he said in verse :

Give me a thousandth part of the meed he gained,
And I will him outsing a thousandfold !⁴

⁴ Ibid. II. 10, 5.

One of the shortest articles in the Lubāb is that on Bihruz-i Ṭabarī, which runs as follows:

"He says, complaining of the injustice of Fortune and the obscurity of the noble and the advancement of the base:

One word I'll say to thee; 'tis worth
Thy hearing, therefore hear it said!
None skilled in song remains on earth,
Because munificence is dead¹."

A slight alteration in the well-known lines which Catullus addressed to Cicero makes them exactly fit the theory of poetry as expounded by Persian bards:

Tanto optimus omnium poeta
Quanto tu optimus omnium patronus.

Lest any one should suspect me of exaggerating, I will translate literally a passage which occurs in a qaṣida by Azraqī of Herāt. He is addressing Sultan Ṭughānshāh ibn Muḥammad, the Seljūq.

If the power of Maḥmūd inspired the genius of 'Unṣurī
To produce those enchanting poems,
So must thy splendour inspire me; for in the scales of poesy
The ideas of the poets weigh less than a single mite.
'Tis praise of thee that causes me to think of beautiful expressions—
Not that their genius was gold and mine is clay².
If the cloud sucks up a drop of my mind (and then sends it down in the shape of rain),
Parrot-heads will blossom from the bough instead of roses³.

The patron, then, is the Muse of Persian court-poetry, and his inspiration is paid for in advance by the encomium which invokes it. Did he fail to respond, he was liable to be satirised as grossly as he was flattered before, so that he had every

² I.e. "I admit that the excellence of my poetry is wholly derived from my patron, but this was equally true of former poets and does not imply that I am inferior in genius to them."

encouragement to behave with liberality. It may be urged that moral considerations should not enter into literary criticism, but this argument loses its force when the artistic form is influenced by a moral or immoral purpose. We take pleasure in well-turned compliments, without inquiring whether they are sincere or no, and the Persian panegyrists supply admirable examples of the kind. But in the encomium the claims of art are secondary: the poet cannot write to please himself; he must sing to his patron's tune. The more extravagant his laudation, the more turgid his rhetoric, and the more ingenious his flattery, the better chance he has of competing successfully with his rivals and securing a rich reward. Therefore extravagance, turgidity, and ingenuity are qualities belonging to the typical qaṣīda since the Ghaznevid period, when it first became fully developed. Their combination with the stock-in-trade of conventional figures, phrases, epithets, assonances, and allusions—the raw material of all this poetry—produces a result which only Persian scholars can appreciate: to dress the qaṣīda in another language is to leave it a shadow of its gorgeous self. With this advertisement, which is at once a warning to my readers and an apology to the poets in question, I will now render into prose or verse some of the less difficult panegyrics that 'Awfī has selected.

O thou who art praised like piety in the season of eld,
 And O thou who art desired like pleasure in the season of youth!
 Thou hast glorious ancestors to the time of Adam,
 Thou wilt have blessed descendants to the Day of Resurrection.
 The two hands of avarice have been tied by thy liberality,
 The two eyes of tyranny have been put to sleep by thy justice.
 Under thy protection the fawn drinks with the lion,
 Through thy majesty the quail consorts with the eagle.
 None ever descried the summit of the mountain of thy clemency,
 None ever saw the bottom of the ocean of thy largesse.
 The steed of thy purpose is always in battle,

The arrow of thy resolution is always speeding from the bow¹.
 That man who in all his speech is most truthful,
 If he utter one word to refute thee, becomes the greatest of liars.
 Surely love of thee is Faith and hate of thee is Infidelity,
 Since thy love and hate are mercy and torment to mankind².
 Upon the waters of thine eye the heads of thy foes are turning;
 Yea, when thine eye is a river, their heads are the water-wheel³.
 'Tis thy policy that keeps the world safe and sound:
 Without thy policy, how would there be safety and soundness?
 All people ask of thee, and thou answerest them—
 May this asking and answering never come to an end!
 The cords of the tent-pavilion of the Monarch's sway
 Thy ambition hath drawn tight over East and West.
 Last year, towards the West it lightened the rein;
 This year, towards the East it is weighing down the stirrup.
 This year it will cross the Oxus victoriously,
 Even as last year it crossed the Euphrates and the Tigris.
 When one looks deeply, 'tis from thy mind and thought have resulted
 His marvellous and astonishing conquests throughout the world.
 In sooth, the world is the sky, the King's conquests are the stars,
 And thy mind and thought are the sun and the astrolabe⁴.

PANEGYRIC ON ZAHÍRU'DDAWLA ABŪ BAKR,
 THE SON OF NIZÁMU 'L-MULK.

If the sphere of Heaven should dare dispute his sovereign will,
 Beyond dispute the celestial ring would be snapped in twain.
 His name strikes awe in the sky; the moon twice seven days old,
 She rises to preach his praise, her pulpit the Milky Way;
 And if he desire to set on his head a diadem,
 The diadem for his rank and worth is the star 'Ayyúq!
 His dagger brings to his foes their doom: well mightst thou say,
 'Tis the foremost guard and the farthest post of the Angel Death.

Oh, what a dagger! whose flame can turn the foemen's tide,
 When strife is kindled and blazes high on the field of fray—
 A flame so bitter, the choking fume of the fire thereof
 From eye and mind of the ill-wisher parts nevermore.
 When forth he flashes from out the heart of the host of love,
 Strong beats the heart of his host to follow with hate the foe.
 The world admires when his war-horse fleet, in panoply
 Of iron mail, appears in the midst of the battle-plain.
 What art shall serve me to picture him—that war-horse fleet?
 He is like a ship, his bit the anchor, his hooves the sail;
 And when he wheels at the gallop, he seems a glorious bride
 With pearls and jewels and gold of his bridle-ornaments¹.
 He lifts his head and o'er the arena charges on
 With circling motion, like the majestic orb of Heaven.
 He plants his foot on the earth and roars; as a cloud is he,
 His bit the lightning thereof, his snort its thunder-clap.
 Thou giv'st him rein, he is wind; thou hold'st him in, he is rock:
 Methinks, his very marrow is made of these two things.
 Yet who saw ever a rock that moves like a rushing wind,
 Or who saw ever a wind whose form resembles a rock?
 In onset he is the peer of Rakhsh and black Shabdíz;
 Zahiru'ddawla, his rider, of Rustam and Chosroes—²
 A prince revered: at his palace-gate the noblest men

 His virtue hid is fairer than all that Beauty shows;
 Tho' Virtue ruling the inward man be a thing sublime,
 His beauty's show is fairer than all that Virtue rules.
 Tho' the sea be lavish of treasure and bountiful in its ways,
 Yet his rich soul surpasses in bounteousness the sea³.

PANEGYRIC ON THE VIZIER NAŞÍRU'DDÍN.

O'er the garden of his judgment never blew the wind of error,
 On the page of his decision never lay the dust of weakness.
 The geometers of wisdom must confess a thousand failures,
 When they would survey the utmost length and breadth of his perfection.

Awe of him is deep-implanted in the heart and eye of monarchs,
 Even as wine's assailing fury in the nature of the drunken.
 Oh, thy fine and subtle statecraft like the star Suhá is hidden, Yet throughout the world 'tis famous, shining as the sun at noonday.

When the shrill sound of thy reed-pen charms away perplexed embroilments,

It might seem the voice of David tunefully the Psalms intoning.
 'Neath the canopy of Heaven thy good nature is the censer
 That doth fill the horizon's bosom full of fragrancy and perfume.
 Round about the pale of Islam thy protection is the rampart
 That defies the might of flaming Sirius to pass across it¹.

(Zahír of Fáryáb.)

Although the faults of this style are evident, while its compensating beauties disappear in translation, I should like to add one or two shorter specimens of the hyperbolical flattery on which the court-poets squander all the fancy and wit they command.

PRAISE OF KING ABÚ NAṢR.

I leave thy gate! And how should I depart,
 When every breath I send into the air

 My genius in this song gave up its soul.
 Thou wilt not grudge to pay the appointed toll,
 For 'twas desire to laud thee, O my Prince,
 Bade o'er my tongue these golden verses roll!³
 ('Imádī of Ghazna.)

That same desire was "the only begetter" of almost every qaṣída in the Lubáb. Their general features do not vary to any great extent and have been sufficiently illustrated by the extracts given above. Intellectual wit has free play in the panegyric, but a sense of humour is seldom allowed to inter-fare with the solemn pose and ceremonious address which the patron's dignity demands. One of these rare exceptions is an ode by Jawharî of Herât, beginning:

Yesterday the imperial	head-groom to me presented
A horse by old age stricken	and crying out for mercy.
* * *	* *
His back grown bare entirely	of flesh, as 'twere a coffin;
Cramfull and stuffed his stomach	with straw, as 'twere a straw-barn.
The skin of his nose all puckered	like to a blacksmith's bellows;
His rump the cauldron, trembling	from one leg to the other ¹ .

When briskly I approached him	with saddle, bit, and bridle,
He said, "Old ignoramus,	injurious, disrespectful!
I am thy senior, pay me	the reverence I merit:
'Tis want of reverence always	hath wrecked thy hopes of fortune.
Ah, seest thou not how broken	am I by age and weakness?
My back a sore, my body	a shadow, my head dizzy!
Art not ashamed to mount me?	Or wilt thou ride unblushing
On me into the mellay	and wheel again for onset?
I carried King Tahmûrath	(quoth he) in the beginning,
When forth he marched to conquer	and founded Marv-i Shahjân;
And I was in the Ark too	in company with Noah,
What time the world-wide Deluge	was spreading waste and ruin ² .

* * *	* *
Then came I to the Sultan,	who showed me all due honour:
For three and sixty years he	hath kept me in his stable.
On thee he did bestow me:	if I take not thy fancy,
Beg from the Sultan's stable	instead of me another!" ³

The ode ends with a few lines equivalent to the English formula, "and thy petitioner will ever pray."

On the whole, we must allow that the difficulties and fatigues encountered in this field of Persian poetry are considerably greater than any pleasure that can be gained from

³ Ibid. II. 117, 1.

it. Its lack of truth and sincerity, the poverty of its ideas, and the shallowness of its sentiment leave at times an impression of disgust which the beautiful diction and brilliant imagery only serve to emphasise. Moreover, the style, pleasingly exotic at the best, in many passages becomes grotesque and ludicrous. Since I have tried to show that the work of the court-poets is not altogether unattractive, I may be pardoned for having selected such pieces as seemed to answer the purpose. Let me now justify my discretion by revealing the obstacles that would lie in the way of a more valorous translator. The chief of these is the fact that Persian poetry is largely composed of elements which are the very antithesis of what we in the West usually mean by the term "poetical"—elements which have long been regarded by us as destructive to poetry, though suitable enough for parody and other forms of light or humorous verse. This view, indeed, has not always prevailed. It was an English poet of the seventeenth century who wrote,

No sires but these will poetry admit:
Madness or wit;

and the definition is applicable to the lyrical poetry of Persia. As for madness, in the sense of divine enthusiasm, the odes written by Şúfís have plenty of it. The court-poets are not in the least mad, but they are immoderately witty. While we may agree that wit sometimes enters into alliance with poetical beauty and is even capable of adding an unexpected touch that contributes to its perfection, none of us would presuppose a natural and intimate connexion between the two. Persian criticism, however, does connect them; and in Persian poetry mere intellectual or verbal ingenuity, far from being a vice, is an admired ornament of style, albeit at some periods and by some poets it is used more sparingly than by the encomiasts who fill the pages of the Lubáb with clever fancies and quaint comparisons. The following specimens, which I have rendered literally, are easily understood and give but a slight notion of the feats accomplished by these Oriental euphuists.

The garden is full of strings of fresh pearls,
 The hill-slopes are full of heaps of pure ambergris.
 'Tis wind and cloud that gave to garden and hill-slope
 Pure ambergris in heaps and fresh pearls in strings.
 The raven is gone, the pheasant is come, and lo, a marvel!—
 The earth like a pheasant's wing, the air like a raven's plume.
 The grove hath become an altar, and the nightingale,
 David-like, is singing psalms on the altar.
 When the air donned mail and corslet of cloud,
 The radiant sun made of his reflexion a bow.
 Of rose-bud and willow-bough the zephyr
 Made an emerald spear and a coral arrow.
 See the poppies amongst the grass,
 And amongst the poppies the tears 'of the cloud:
 The grass like verdigris dashed with vermilion,
 The poppies like vermilion dashed with quicksilver.
 The tears of the cloud are rose-water, the blossoms camphor,
 The water in the stream and rivulet is like sandal-wood¹.
 Since the temperature of the world is not yet very hot,
 Why are camphor, sandal-wood, and rose-water used as remedies for it?²

(Mu'izzí.)

Here are the opening lines of a qaṣida by 'Am'aq of Bukhárá. "All the poets," says 'Awfí, "are unanimously of opinion that no one before him ever composed verses like these and that no one after him has been able to equal them."

If an ant utter speech and if a hair have life,
 I am that speaking ant, I am that living hair.
 My body is like the shadow of a hair, and my soul is like the eye of an ant³,
 Because of the absence of her whose hair is fragrant with gháliya and who hath an ant-like waist⁴.

³ I.e. contracted with pain. "A narrow heart" means in Persian "an oppressed and sorrowful heart."

⁴ Lubáb, II. 181, 11.

A little of this goes a long way. My last quotation is a lover's complaint, which occurs in the exordium of an ode by Abu 'l-Ma'álí.

I am not seeking diversion and I am not desiring pleasure,
I am not keeping patience and I am not getting sleep.
My tears, which have a resemblance to quicksilver,
Turn to pure gold when they trickle down my yellow cheeks.
By the tears of mine eye and the hue of my cheek Natural philosophers are assured that quicksilver is the basis of gold¹.

CHAPTER II

THE MEDITATIONS OF MA'ARRÍ.

Hope as thou wilt in heat or cold,
It matters not amidst the surge
Of woes that whelmed thee from of old
And whence thou never canst emerge.

ABU 'L-'ALÁ AL-MA'ARRÍ.

The name of Abu 'l-'Alá al-Ma'arrí¹ is not one of those which any body of educated Moslems would be likely to receive with placid approbation or polite indifference; and readers of this essay will feel, though less acutely, that the words of the old blind poet, who died in Syria eight hundred and sixty years ago, ring out to-day as a challenge to deep and irreconcilable antagonisms in the nature of mankind. Is life to be desired or death? Is the world good or evil? Shall we enjoy it if we can or spurn it utterly? What is the truth about religion? Does it come to us from God, as the orthodox pretend? Are we to follow authority and tradition or reason and conscience? Such are some of the questions with which Ma'arrí concerns himself. While his reflections—not pursued methodically, but set down piecemeal and at intervals—might be described as extensive and peculiar, we must not exaggerate their intrinsic value. Von Kremer's essay, for which in general I have nothing but praise, seems to me to suffer from want of proportion. It hails Ma'arrí as an original thinker, centuries in advance of his age, and discusses his theory and practice as though he were a philosopher writing in verse. Without denying that Ma'arrí was a pioneer of Aufklärung, or that his open-minded and independent way of looking at things led him to conclusions which often agree with those of modern thought, I submit that Von Kremer has put the cart before the horse. Ma'arrí is, first of all and essentially, a poet. His philosophy and ethics are only a background for his poetry. His work is artistic in treatment and execution and should be weighed by the standard which we apply to the Divina Commedia or the Paradise Lost. He sits below Dante and Milton, but he belongs to their school; and if he contemplates life with the profound feeling of Lucretius, he handles his subject with a literary skill as fine as that of Horace. Probably very few Europeans have read these poems, the Luzúmiyyât, from beginning to end. I am sure that any one who has accomplished the feat, or may do so in the future, will acknowledge the author's mastery of the Arabic language—a mastery which too frequently displays itself in juggling with words—the aptness of his diction, the force and opulence of his imagery, the surprising turns of his fancy, and the charm of a style unmistakably his own, whose melancholy dirge-like cadences blend with sharper notes of wit, satire, and epigram. The matter is almost as remarkable as the style. Ma'arrí aims at telling the truth, although according to Moslem theory poets not only are but ought to be liars. Taking Reason for his guide, he judges men and things with a freedom which must have seemed scandalous to the rulers and privileged classes of the day. Amidst his meditations on the human tragedy a fierce hatred of injustice, hypocrisy, and superstition blazes out. Vice and folly are laid bare in order that virtue and wisdom may be sought. In his poetry we see the age depicted without fear or favour, and—what is more appealing—the artist himself, struggling with doubts, yet confident in the power of mind to solve difficulties and give light, if any can be looked for. But (lest I slip after Von Kremer) much of the Luzüm is monotonous; a great deal is trivial and pedantic and to our taste intolerably clever: it moves us to admiration and contempt, it thrills, fatigues, fascinates, and repels; and when all has been said, it remains unique and immortal because it expresses the personality of an extraordinary man.

Abu 'l-'Alá Aḥmad ibn 'Abdallah al-Ma'arri¹ was born in A.D. 973 at Ma'arra (Ma'arratu 'l-Nu'mán), a country-town in the district south of Aleppo². His family might boast of its cadis and poets, but its talents appear to have been more respectable than brilliant. The fact that neither his father nor his cousin nor his maternal uncle ever made the pilgrimage to Mecca is worth recording in view of the importance which he ascribes to example and custom in the formation of religious belief. Ere he was four years old, he suffered the first calamity of his life: an attack of small-pox left him partially, and soon completely, blind. After his father's death—he was then about fourteen—he devoted himself to study, visiting Aleppo, Antioch, and other Syrian towns, learning by heart the manuscripts preserved in their libraries, and attending the lectures of many celebrated scholars. As Professor Margoliouth remarks, his memory was prodigious. We can hardly conceive how one who so early lost his sight should have been able to compose letters and treatises thickly sown with quotations which, although they are sometimes inaccurate, show a knowledge of Arabic poetry and philology such as the most industrious grammarians seldom possessed. Having finished his studies, he returned in A.D. 993 to Ma'arra, perhaps with the intention of becoming a professional poet, that is to say, a writer of panegyrics for which he might reckon upon being paid handsomely. This was no career for a man of spirit and honour to embark on. If it tempted him, he soon put it aside: in the preface to his first collection of poems he says that he never wrote encomia for money, but only because he wished to gain practice in the art. During the next fifteen years (A.D. 993–1008) his whole income was a pension of about 30 dīnārs which his blindness compelled him to share with a servant; possibly he may have earned a little more by teaching. Meanwhile he was making a reputation beyond the borders of his native town, and his thoughts turned to Baghdād, “the great field of genius and exertion, where talents of every kind had the fullest scope and the highest encouragement¹.” In 1008 he set out from Aleppo, travelling down the Euphrates in a boat provided by his uncle. It seems clear that he hoped to establish himself permanently in the capital; and he ought to have counted the cost of his refusal to live by belauding the great. “I found Baghdād,” he says, “like a pie’s wing—fair, but carrying nothing².” While his reception by the savants and academicians whom he met there was flattering enough to console him for occasional slights, and perhaps friendly enough to procure him the means of livelihood, he felt that his prospects were uncertain. According to Professor Margoliouth, an indignity put upon him by the brother of the Sharīf al-Raḡī was the last straw. Anyhow, eighteen months after entering Baghdād he started on his way home³. He took this step reluctantly and always writes of it with unfeigned regret, as in the following lines:

اذا رايت امورا لا توافقني * قلت الاياب الى الاوطان ادي ذا

How sad that I returned, how sad,
Instead of dying at Bagdad!
I say, whene’er things fall amiss,
“My coming home hath brought me this.”⁴

² The Letters of Abu ’l-’Alá, p. 37.

⁴ Luzüm, I. 303, 5.

The sense of disillusion and failure with which he quitted Baghdád appears in a letter addressed to the people of Ma'arra shortly before his arrival amongst them. He declares that he has now ended his youth and bidden farewell to his spring-time, and that he finds the best course for him to pursue is to go into retreat.

"My soul did not consent to my returning till I had promised it three things—seclusion as complete as that of (the star) al-Fanîq in the constellation of the Bull; separation from the world like that of the egg-shell from the chick; and to remain in the city even though the inhabitants fled through fear of the Greeks.... What I wanted was to stay in a place of learning: and I found out the most precious of spots, but fate did not allow me to stay there, and only a fool will quarrel with destiny¹."

Here is pessimism, asceticism, fatalism—the stuff of which his later poems are made. It would be curious if their rationalism, another prime ingredient, owed nothing to the "intellectuals" of Baghdád. Considered broadly in relation to the poet's development, these two years (1008-9) were decisive. The change of scene, the sudden plunge into metropolitan society, the literary discussions, the conversations with men of all races and creeds, the conflict of old dogmas and new ideas, then the wreck of his hopes and the burial of his ambitions in silence and solitude—need we ask whether such an experience did not stimulate his genius and alter the bent of his mind? From this standpoint the episode was entirely fortunate. Had he not gone to Baghdád, probably the Luzúmiyyât would never have been written, and (in Europe at any rate) his fame as a poet would be very different from what it is.

Ma'arrí lived in retirement until his death in A.D. 1058, fifty years later. Proud, sensitive, and suspicious, doubly imprisoned by blindness and seclusion², a misanthropic and world-weary old man—that is the character which his poems give of him; but a true portrait shows light as well as shade

To quote Professor Margoliouth,

the result of his visit to Baghdád, where the leading writers of the time had treated him as one of themselves, became apparent as soon as he came back. Disciples began to flock to Ma'arra from all quarters to hear his lectures on the grammar, poetry, and antiquities of the Arabs. The house or cave which he inhabited became the chief sight in Ma'arra, and he himself the most important inhabitant. . . . The letters, most of which were written after the return from Baghdád, exhibit the author as anything but a hermit; he appears rather as a man of many friends, who takes a kindly interest both in men and things.

Besides teaching, he occupied his mind with composing the Luzúmiyyát and dictating to his amanuenses a large number of philological and other works of which, for the most part, the titles alone have been preserved.

The poetry of Ma'arri recalls a long-drawn controversy, which has never wholly died out, between two schools of Islamic criticism. One party maintained that with the coming of Islam the golden age of Arabic poetry had gone for ever. A poet's rank was decided by his date. To have lived in that age, to have spoken the pure Bedouin idiom uncontaminated by foreign conquests, to have practised the traditional virtues and to have been inspired by the chivalrous ideals of heathendom conferred a superiority outweighing every other consideration. In the eyes of early Mohammedan philologists and antiquarians—whose authority rested securely on the universal respect for learning and was but little diminished by their incompetence in matters of taste—the pagan odes fixed an unapproachable standard by which all Moslem poets should be judged; so that an imitation of them, good or bad, was more highly esteemed than any original work of genius. Pedantry, no doubt; but in justice to those old scholars we ought to reflect that they were concerned with one particular type of poetry, the Ode (qaṣída), which was the product of Arabian antiquity and corresponded in its characteristic features to conditions of life that actually existed in the pre-Islamic period¹. When these conditions vanished, the qaṣīda became an anachronism but continued to be the chief medium of poetical expression, since none of the minor types was capable of filling its place. Failing the invention of a new form of equal dignity, the qaṣīda held the field. What was a modern poet to do? Was he to assume the consecrated pose of bidding his two comrades halt awhile and weep with him over a certain camping-ground, desolate now, but still haunted by dear and regretful memories? And was he to describe the hardships, which he had never known, of a journey across the desert, and pretend to be as intimately acquainted with camels, horses, wild asses, antelopes, and lizards as he truly was with the rhymed loci classici in which the habits of these animals are so well delineated? If, on the other hand, like Mutanabbí and Ma'arri, he made fun of the obsolete fashions and re-shaped them to suit the facts of his time, academic persons might (and did) protest that his more or less novel adaptation was not poetry at all. It appears to me that those who championed the ancients were both right and wrong. They were right in preferring the model to the copy. They were wrong when they set it up as a test of all poetic values and declared it to be so perfect that nothing of a different kind could bear comparison with it. To assert that since A.D. 622 there has been no Arabic poet of the first class is ridiculous; and though more great poets lived in the century before Islam than in any subsequent period of the same duration, I think it may reasonably be questioned whether Imra'u 'l-Qays and his fellows are superior in genius to Abú Nuwás, Mutanabbí, and others who flourished under the 'Abbásid Caliphate². If some cannot admire the ancients without depreciating the moderns, not a few will justify the proud boast of Ma'arri—

وإني وإن كنتُ الأخيرَ زمانُهُ * لآتٍ بما لم تستطعه الأوائلُ

And I, albeit I come in Time's late hour,

Achieve what lay not in the ancients' power³.

³ Saḡtu 'l-Zand (Búlâq, A.H. 1286), I. 110, 20.

For my part, when I turn from the authors of the Mu'allaqât to the great Islamic poets, I do not miss what I do not expect to find; and I find beauties enough in both to compensate me for the deficiencies of either. Thanks mainly to Rückert and Sir Charles Lyall, the worth of old Arabian poetry is now understood everywhere. Let us hope the day is coming when it will be possible to make that statement as regards Arabic poetry in general.

What has been said of Coleridge, that "his poems lie as it were in two strata," is also true of Ma'arri. Those of his first manner, the odes comprised in the Saqtu 'l-Zand and mostly written before the age of thirty-five, show the influence of his admiration for Mutanabbî and in comparison with the Luzûmiyyât are nearly as conventional as the poems written by Coleridge before 1797. They include some fine panegyrics and elegies but have small interest for us. In the East, however, the Saqtu 'l-Zand has always been more popular than the Luzûm, which Mohammedans usually dislike on account of the opinions put forth in it, while neither its form nor its character accords with their notion of what poetry ought to be. As we have seen, the regular type of Arabic poetry is the ode; but in the Luzûm Ma'arri discards this time-honoured model, substituting for it an informal composition which may contain any number of verses from two or three to eighty or ninety. How these poems strike the average Moslem we can learn from the apology which Ma'arri thinks it necessary to make for them. He says in effect¹:

"I have not sought to embellish my verse by means of fiction or fill my pages with love idylls, battle-scenes, descriptions of wine-parties and the like. My aim is to speak the truth. Now, the proper end of poetry is not truth, but falsehood², and in proportion as it is diverted from its proper end its perfection is impaired. Therefore I must crave the indulgence of my readers for this book of moral poetry."

² "Usu receptum est in poesi ignavum se fortem iactare, castum sectatoris mulierum uestes induere, et debilem se ornare cultu uiri acris atque audacis" (from the preface to the Saqtu 'l-Zand, translated by Rieu, De Abul-Alae uita et carminibus, p. 36). Cf. the current saying, "The most agreeable poetry is the most false" (اعذب الشعر اكذب). Ma'arri quotes

In other words, Ma'arri holds that truth—he means moral and philosophical truth—so far from being the standard of poetical merit, is positively injurious to it. He does not imply that the best poetry is untrue to life, but rather that it is false because it follows human life and nature, which belong to the vanities of this world and are themselves radically false. He knows that he cannot compete with his “profane” brethren who are free to employ all the resources of invention and imagination; and foreseeing that his readers will be disappointed, he hastens to assure them that the fault lies in the subject, not in the poet. A Mohammedan scholar, who in his recently published memoir of Ma'arri has made a valuable contribution to learning, cites this passage as evidence that the Luzûm is really “a volume of philosophy¹.” If that were so, we might ask why the author not only composed it in verse but adopted an almost incredibly difficult form of rhyme, the explanation of which gives his preface the appearance of a treatise on prosody. But I need not argue the point further. Ma'arri says that the Luzûm is “diction devoid of falsehood” (قَوْلٌ عَرَبِيٌّ مِنَ الْمَيْنِ), i.e., poetry of an inferior kind.

from al-Aşma'î “Poetry is one of the gates (categories) of vanity,” and he might have added that poets were called liars by Mohammed (Koran, 26, 226). The following extracts from Şuyûṭî's Muzhir (Bûlâq, A.H. 1282, vol. II. p. 234 fol.; Thornton's Arabic Series: Second Reading Book, Cambridge, 1909, p. 21 fol.) show the view of many good Moslems on this subject: “There are certain conditions which must be fulfilled before any one is called a poet. If his object were to speak the truth without exaggerating or going beyond the mark or lying or relating things absolutely impossible, although his work might be faultless in metre, it would have no value (as poetry), and the name of poet would not be given to him. It was said by a man of acute mind that gay poetry raises a laugh, while grave poetry is fiction: therefore the poet has no choice but to tell lies or to make people laugh; and such being the case, Allah has preserved His Prophet from these two qualities (i.e. Mohammed was not a poet, as his enemies alleged) and from everything ignoble. . . . Some one may observe that now and then wisdom is found in poetry, according to the Prophet's saying, ‘Truly, there is in eloquence a magic and in poetry a wisdom.’ I reply, ‘For the reason which we have mentioned, Allah preserved him from poetising; and as for wisdom, Allah has bestowed on him the largest and amplest portion thereof in the Koran and the Sunna.’”

We who dissent from his theory judge otherwise of his work. Although moral, religious, and philosophical ideas are not the essence of poetry, they have inspired the greatest poets, and where genius is equal they will turn the scale. Whether and to what extent they enhance the merit of a poem depends on the author's power to give them artistic and original expression: the most striking doctrines and speculations may have less value for this purpose than thoughts and feelings with which everyone is familiar. Von Kremer's view of Ma'arri led him to ignore the latter element; hence the passages which he translated stand somewhat apart, so to speak, from the main themes. These are simple and even commonplace: the pain of life, the peace of death, the wickedness and folly of mankind, the might of Fate and the march of Time, the emptiness of ambition, the duty of renunciation, the longing for solitude and then—to rest in the grave. The pessimism of the Luzûm wears the form of an intense pervading darkness, stamping itself on the mind and deeply affecting the imagination¹. It is an old philosophy and its poets have been many, but I can think of none who in sincerity, individuality, and eloquence has surpassed Abu 'l-'Alá al-Ma'arri².

The book derives its title from a "troublesome bondage" (to borrow Milton's phrase) voluntarily imposed on himself by the author in regard to the rhyme³. Although the nature of this cannot be explained properly without using technical terms which I wish to avoid, the so-called "rich rhymes" of French versification are a close parallel and will serve to illustrate what is meant. Conceive a French poem of ten, fifteen, or twenty verses, every verse having not only the same rhyme but the same consonant preceding the rhyme-vowel, e.g., plume, allume, enclume; mirage, enrage, ouvrage, parage; further, conceive hundreds of poems rhymed throughout in this manner and arranged according to the alphabetical sequence of the final consonant, so that those with the rhyme lume are placed under m, those with the rhyme rage under g, and so on—the analogy, such as it is, may help readers ignorant of Arabic to measure the enormous labour which the composition of the Luzúmiyyát must have entailed. There is nothing like it, of course, in any European language; even in Arabic, a language that seems to have been made for virtuosity, we find only a few brief and isolated specimens to set beside it¹. Were Ma'arrí a minor poet, the Luzúm would be a senseless tour de force. Some of it is not very remote from that description, and the tyranny of the rhyme exacts a crushing toll of repetition, monotony, banality, obscurity, and affectation. Still, take it all in all, the work is shaped by the artist, not by the mould which it fills slowly and reluctantly. I do not think so poorly of his powers as to believe, with some Mohammedan and European critics, that the difficulty of the form compelled him to say what he never would have said if he had been his own master. No doubt, he is apt to be dragged down by his chains, but often he can move in them with such dexterity and ease that they appear rather an ornament than a hindrance.

³ The words Luzûmu mâ lá yalzam signify "The obligation of that which is not obligatory."

The Luzúm contains 1592 poems amounting, I suppose, to between twelve and thirteen thousand verses altogether. When the author declares that they glorify God, exhort the heedless, and warn against the vanity and wickedness of the world¹, he does not indicate either the range of their topics or the variety of their style. He was interested in many things besides asceticism: he was a keen student of passing events, he professed to know his contemporaries by heart², and we shall see how political and social phenomena reflect themselves in his meditations. Recalling his avowed intention to tell the truth, one may find there the best commentary on his way of telling it. For him Truth was a mystery—

And Falsehood like a star all naked stands,
But Truth still hides her face 'neath hood and veil³.

By hard living and thinking he strove to lift that veil, and the laboured utterance, the dark hints and metaphors—in short, the oracular quality of his verse—are only in keeping with the physical and mental strain which he had undergone. Closer acquaintance with the Luzûm has persuaded me that its obscurity is more natural and less deliberate than I once imagined. Ma'arri had good reason to cloak some of his opinions, and being a sensible as well as a cautious man, he did not court persecution, though in fact the most heretical passages of his work are by no means the most obscure. Apart from special causes his style, as I said before, is the expression of a strange untempered personality⁴, while in the second place it is the product of a poet who seldom allows us to forget that he was also a very learned scholar. His love of grammar, prosody, rhetoric, and belles-lettres asserts itself extravagantly; some poems are mere strings of word-plays. This feature spoils many pages for us, but it is not invariable, as will be acknowledged by those who read the Arabic text of the poems translated below. These, though representative as regards the author's ideas, are comparatively plain in style and include no example of what he could do when he ran to the opposite extreme.

Following Sir Charles Lyall, a master in the art, I have sometimes tried to imitate the original metres without the monorhyme, which in a language like ours lays too heavy a burden upon the translator. Arabic metres being quantitative, their equivalents in a modern European tongue are necessarily imperfect. It is not possible to reproduce the movement and cadence of the Luzûmiyyât except in the same way as the movement and cadence of the Iliad are reproduced, or rather suggested, by a version in English hexameters; yet, shadowy as the resemblance is, it conveys something of real value, which is more easily felt than described. Like the broken vase in Moore's song, these Oriental rhythms have a perfume that "clings to them still." More than that we dare not hope for: even when transplanted by skilful hands they lose the best of their beauty and never become quite acclimatised.

I have thought it well to give the names and schemes of the four principal metres for the sake of those who do not know them already, together with specimens in Arabic, Latin, and English. It will be observed that the Latin renderings are weightier than the English, because (coinciding in this respect with the originals) they are based on quantity instead of accent. Besides weight, however, Arabic has a peculiar sonority which Latin does not possess in the same degree and which is greatly increased by the recurring monorhyme.

- I. Life and Death.
- II. Human Society.
- III. Asceticism.
- IV. Philosophy and Religion.

This arrangement has the advantage of distributing the contents of the work in something like their due order and proportion, and of helping the reader to judge it as a whole more fairly than from the extracts published by Von Kremer, which are not so numerous or representative as mine; but I confess that I have with difficulty resisted the temptation to show how fine and original a poet Ma'arrí is by gathering his best pieces into one garland. The poems in the first three sections offer a wide survey of his theory, practice, and experience of life. While their figurative language may sometimes require explanation, I do not think they call for a preliminary statement of the philosophical ideas which lie beneath. We can understand and enjoy them without knowing how Ma'arrí conceived of God, fate, time, space, spirit, and matter. What he has to say about these and other subjects—the influence of the stars, the immortality of the soul, the doctrine of transmigration, the nature of religion, etc.—particularly excites our curiosity, and many will consider that it is the quintessence of his poetry; as a rule, however, it occurs only in brief passages which must be taken out of their context and examined side by side before we can draw any sure evidence from them. That is the task I have attempted in the fourth section, where the author's philosophy and his attitude towards positive religion will be discussed.

LIFE AND DEATH.

(1)

In the casket of the Hours
 Events deep-hid
 Wait on their guardian Powers
 To raise the lid.

And the Maker infinite,
 Whose poem is Time,
 He need not weave in it
 A forced stale rhyme.

The Nights pass so,
 Voices dumb,
 Without sense quick or slow
 Of what shall come¹.

* * * * *

By Allah's will preserving
 From misflight,
 The barbs of Time unswerving
 On us alight.

A loan is all he gives
 And takes again;
 With his gift happy lives
 The folly of men².

(2)

(Metre: Tawil, with variations.)

Would that a lad had died in the very hour of birth
 And never sucked, as she lay in childbed, his mother's breast!
 Her babe, it says to her or ever its tongue can speak,
 "Nothing thou gett'st of me but sorrow and bitter pain."³

¹ Time is not a conscious agent which can be described as moving quickly or slowly: it is the passive environment in which events appear. Cf. No. 225 and Luzüm, II. 273, 9: "Time is silent, but its events interpret it aloud, so that it seems to speak."

² I. 67, 4.

³ I. 63, 6.

(Metre: Tawil.)

(3)

This world, O my friend, is like a carcase unsepulchred,
 And we are the dogs that yelp around it on every side.
 A loser is he, whoso advances to eat thereof;
 A gainer is he, whoso returns from it hungry still.
 If any be not waylaid by calamities in the night,
 Some ill hap of Time is sure to meet him at morningtide¹.

(Metre: Tawil.)

(4)

The soul feels a shock of pain, when Time's thunderbolt o'erwhelms
 With ruin; a thrill of joy, when softly he sings to her²;
 And whence are the paths for us prepared that our feet may fall,
 She knows not, or where the beds ordained that we lay our sides.
 These Hours, they seem as snakes of black and of white colure³,
 So deadly, the fingers lack all boldness in touching them.
 Mankind are the breaths, I ween, of Earth: one is upward borne
 To us, whilst in ebbing wave another returns to dust.
 I drank it, my forty years' existence, and gulped it down,
 But ah, what a bitter draught! and nowise it did me good.
 We live ignorant and die in errancy as we lived:
 Besotted with wickedness, a man turns not back again⁴.

(5)

Ye stand still beneath Heaven
 Whose wheels by Force are driven;
 And choose in freedom while
 The Fates look on and smile⁵.

(Metre: Wáfir.)

(6)

They mustered for setting out, 'twas a morn of promise:
 "Now surely," they said, "a rain on the land is fallen."
 Mayhap those weather-wise who observe the lightning

¹ I. 224, 10.² Cf. I. 265, last line: "The deceiving World sang to thee, and thy love of her was a lute in her hand."³ Time with its nights and days is represented as a serpent having alternate bands of black and white. Cf. No. 24, last verse, and No. 84, verse 3.⁴ II. 77, 10.⁵ I. 332, 3.

Shall perish before they win of it any bounty.
 The folk oft-times are saved in a land of famine,
 The fruitful and rich champaign may destroy its people¹.

(7)

(Metre: Tawil, with variations.)

'Tis God's will a man should live in torment and tribulation, Until those that know him cry, "He hath paid now the lifelong debt."
 Give joy to his next of kin on the day of his departure,
 For they gain a heritage of riches, and he of peace².

(8)

(Metre: Tawil.)

The greatest of all the gifts of Time is to give up all :
 Whate'er he bestows on thee, his hand is outstretched to seize.
 More excellence hath a life of want than a life of wealth,
 And better than monarch's fine apparel the hermit's garb.
 I doubt not but Time one day will raise an event of power
 To scatter from Night's swart brow her clustering Pleiades.
 Ere Noah and Adam, he the twins of the Lesser Bear Unveiled : they are called not yet amongst bears grown grey and old.
 Let others run deep in talk, preferring this creed or that,
 But mine is a creed of use : to hold me aloof from men.
 Methinks, on the Hours we ride to foray as cavaliers :
 They speed us along like mares of tall make and big of bone.
 What most wears Life's vesture out is grief which a soul endures,
 Unable to bring once back a happiness past and gone³.

(9)

O Death ! be thou my guest : I am tired of living,
 And I have tried both sorts in joy and sorrow.
 My morrow shall be my yesterday, none doubts it ;
 My yesterday nevermore shall be my morrow⁴.

¹ I. 93, 2.² I. 69, penult.³ I. 123, 10.⁴ I. 286, penult.

Perish this world! I should not joy to be
 Its Caliph or Maḥmūd¹.
 My fate I know not, save that I in turn
 Am treading the same path to the same bourne
 As old 'Ād and Thamūd².
 The mountains ('tis averred) shall melt, the seas
 Surely shall freeze;
 And the great dome of Heaven, whose poles
 Have ever awed men's souls,
 Some argue for its ruin, some maintain
 Its immortality—in vain?³
 The scattered boulders of the lava waste,
 Shall e'er they mingle into one massed ore?⁴
 If sheer catastrophe shall fling in haste
 The Pleiad luminaries asunder,
 Well may be quenched the fiery brand of Mars;
 And if decay smites Indian scimitars,
 Survival of their sheaths would be a wonder!⁵

(Metre: Wáfir.)

O child of a tender mother—and surely Allah
 Is able to bring to pass whatsoe'er He pleaseth—
 Thou after thy death, destroyed by the hap most hateful,
 Yet speakest and warnest us with a voice of wisdom.
 "Unwilling" (thou sayst) "in this world I alighted
 And lived; and how oft was medicined, how oft was potioned!
 A year, month after month, I made by climbing—
 And would I had never climbed on the new moons' ladder!
 And when I was called away and my hour of weaning⁶
 Drew nigh, Death sought me out and I found no warder.

¹ Sultan Maḥmūd of Ghazna died in A.D. 1030, twenty-eight years before the death of Ma'arri.

² Extinct aboriginal tribes: the legend of their destruction is told in the Koran.

³ Cf. No. 220.

⁴ Literally, "Shall silver (fiḍḍat) one day be made to prevail over lava (fiḍḍat), so that the stones of the latter shall become like an ingot?"

⁵ I. 262, 3. The "scimitars" represent the stars and planets, which are "sheathed" by the celestial spheres.

⁶ Separation from the world.

Life's house I abandoned, empty, to other tenants,
 And wretched I must have been had I still remained there.
 I went forth pure, unsoiled: had my lease of living
 Been long, I had soiled ta'en and had lost my pureness.
 Oh, why dost thou weep? It may be that I am chosen
 To dwell with the blessed souls in the state hereafter.
 'Gainst evil the women charmed me, but when my day dawned,
 It left me as though I ne'er had been charmed by charmers.
 Suppose I had lived as long as the vulture, only
 To meet Death at the last: I had either suffered
 The poor man's wrong, oppressed without fear of Allah,
 Or else I had been a ruler of men who feared me.
 'Tis one of the boons my Lord hath bestowed upon me,
 That hastily I departed and did not tarry."¹

(Metre: Tawil.)

The sage looketh in the glass of Reason, but he that makes
 His brethren his looking-glass will see truth, mayhap, or lies².
 And I, shall I fear the pain of Allah, when He is just,
 And though I have lived the life of one wronged and racked with pain?
 Yes: each hath his portioned lot; but men in their ignorance
 Would mend here the things they loathe that never can mended be³.

Nor birth I chose nor old age nor to live:
 What the Past grudged me shall the Present give?
 Here must I stay, by Doom's both hands constrained,
 Nor go until my going is ordained.
 You who would guide me out of dark illusion,
 You lie—your story does but make confusion.
 For can you alter that you brand with shame,
 Or is it not unalterably the same?⁴

¹ I. 168, 9.² Cf. I. 383, 15:

The mirrors of the eye show nothing true:
 Make for thyself a mirror of clear thought.

³ I. 120, last line.⁴ I. 322, 4.

Leisurely through life's long gloom
 I have journeyed to my tomb;
 Now that I am come so near,
 Needs my soul must quake with fear.

What are we? what all that stirs
 In this teeming universe
 To a Power which, unspent,
 Swallows the whole firmament?

Thunder roared: methought it was
 A fell lion from whose jaws
 Full in front of him there hung Lolling many a lightning-tongue¹.

(Metre: Basit.)

(15)

'Tis want of wit to disdain good counsel frankly bestowed
 And still desire that the Days make right the wrong that they do.
 Let Time alone and its folk to mind their business themselves;
 Live thou in doubt of the world, mistrusting all of its kind.
 Youth rode away: not a word of news about him have we,
 Nor us revisits of him a wraith to gladden our eyes.
 Ah, had we won to a land where Youth is, how should we grudge
 Our camels' due—saddles wrought of fragrant Indian wood?
 A man grows older and leaves his prime in pawn to Decay,
 Then gets a new gaberdine of hoariness to put on;
 And live he never so long, repentance tarries behind
 Until the Dooms on him fall ere any vow he hath ta'en.
 Fate's equinoctial line sprang from a marvellous point,
 That into nothingness shot lines, pens, and writers and all!²

(16)

This folk, I know not what befools them,
 And worse their fathers sinned, maybe;
 Their senseless prayers for him who rules them
 The pulpit almost weeps to see³.

¹ II. 81, last line.² I. 106, 9.³ Since Fate decides all, it is folly to pray for the reigning prince. Von Kremer (op. cit. p. 67) thinks that these lines are aimed at the Fātimid conquerors of Syria and imply that the people had no choice but to submit.

Loth came we and reluctant go
 And forced endure the time between.
 Allah, to whom our praises flow,
 Beside His might grand words are mean.

Life seems the vision of one sleeping
 Which contraries interpret after:
 'Tis joy whenever thou art weeping,
 Thy smiles are tears, and sobs thy laughter;
 And Man, exulting in his breath,
 A prisoner kept in chains for death¹.

(17)

From Doom, determined that no state shall stand,
 Nor gift nor guard can save the tyrant king,
 Not though the planet Mars were in his hand
 A shaft, and Jupiter a target-ring².

(18)

Plague on this body, full of dole,
 Thy fated thoroughfare, O soul!
 And may this soul accursed be,
 O body, whilst it fares through thee!

Ye twain were wedded and made one,
 And by your wedlock was begun
 The birth of portents which unbind
 Havoc and ruin to mankind³.

(19)

(Metre: Tawil.)

Shall ever the dead man's soul return after he is gone,
 To render his kin the meed of thanks for their flowing tears?
 The hearse-bearers' necks and hands conveyed him—a change of state

From when to and fro he fared in palanquins all of gold;

¹ I. 325, 13. Cf. I. 328, 5–9 (a remarkably close parallel) and II. 305, 2:
 “This life is a dream: if a vision of evil occurs in it, expect the vision to be fortunate. When a man slumbers, he may dream that he is weeping and wake with a new feeling of joy in which there is no pain.” Cf. also II. 126, 6:
 “They have asserted that the miserable man is he who gained prosperity in the world, and that the true happiness belongs to the most miserable.
 If such be the fact, then the world is a dream that makes censure a farce.”

² II. 23, 6.

³ II. 149, 13.

And liefer had he alive been trodden below their feet
 Than high they had lifted up his corpse on their shoulders borne.
 O levelling Death! to thee a rich man is like a poor,
 Thou car'st not that one hath hit the right way, another missed.
 The knight's coat of mail thou deem'st in softness a maiden's shift,
 And frail as the spider's house the domed halls of Chosroes.
 To earth came he down unhorsed when Death in the saddle sate,
 Tho' aye 'mongst his clan was he the noblest of them that ride.
 A bier is but like a ship: it casteth its wrecked away
 To drown in a sea of death where wave ever mounts on wave¹.

Ah, let us go, whom nature gave firm minds and courage fast,
 To meet the Fates pursuing us, that we may die at last.
 The draught of Life, to me it seems the bitterest thing to drain,
 And lo, in bitter sooth we all must spew it out again².

World-wide seems to spread a fragrance
 From the sweetness of the flowers.
 All praise Him, the All-sustainer,
 Clouds and plants and rocks and water.
 We—we burden Earth so sorely
 That she well-nigh sinks beneath us³.

I charged my soul and fondly counselled her,
 But she would not comply.
 My sins in number as the sands—no care
 To count them up have I.
 My daily lot comes, be my hand remiss,
 Or near to it, or far
 As Pleiades and Spica Virginis
 And Sirius' twofold star⁴.

¹ I. 123, 2.² I. 54, 9.³ I. 323, 2.⁴ I. 66, 3.

(Metre : Basît.)

(23)

Life ends, and no jar for us who thirst was bled of its wine,
 Nor cupped thro' long years of drought our camel aged and worn¹.
 And so we part, nothing won whereby we plainly should know
 What purpose touching the earth's inhabitants was designed.
 This knowledge neither do tales tradition-borne to us give Nor any star that is watched by patient eyes on the earth.
 Time fades away with us, bleaching all the green of our leaf;
 No sooner each crop anew springs up than lo, it is mown².

(24)

In these thy days the learned are extinct,
 O'er them night darkens, and our human swarms
 Roam guideless since the black mare lost her blaze³.
 All masculines are servants of the Lord,
 All feminines His handmaids. The moon, now thin Riding on high, now full, the Lesser Bear.
 Water and clay, the Pleiads and the sun,
 Earth, sky, and morning—are not all these His?
 No sage will chide thee for confessing that.
 O brother, let me pray God to forgive me,
 For but a gasp of breath in me remains.
 "The noble"? Ay, we talk of them. Our age
 Hath only persons, names, tales long ago
 For gain invented and by fools re-told.
 Yonder bright stars to my true fancy seem Nets which the hunter Time flings o'er his prey.
 How wondrously is mortal fate fulfilled!
 And seeing Death at work—the husband's kin
 And wife's consumed together and none spared—
 Wise men towards submission shape their will.

¹ In seasons of famine the pre-Islamic Arabs made use of camel's blood which they put into a gut and broiled.

³ The commentator supposes the meaning to be "since the world was deprived of those most conspicuous for learning and wisdom." According to Von Kremer (op. cit. p. 70), "the black mare" refers to the 'Abbásid dynasty, which adopted black as its official colour; and this is probably the correct interpretation.

Ever since falsehood was, it ruled the world,
 And sages died in anger. O Asmá,
 Look for a certain day to find thee out,
 Wert thou a chamois on a peak unclimbed.
 If the four enemy humours in man's body
 Concordant mix, he thrives; else tirelessly
 They sow disease and swooning. I have found
 The world a ruffian brute, exempt from law—
 "Wounds by a brute inflicted go scot-free"—¹
 A thing of nights and days; in the which aspect Life's black and white bespeckled snake creeps on².

(Metre: Basít.)

Were I sent out to explore this world of thine by a band Migrating hither, from me no liar's tale would they hear, But words like these: "'Tis a land whose herbs are sickness and plague,
 Its sweetest water distils a bane for generous souls.
 Oh, 'tis the torment of Hell! Make haste, up, saddle and ride
 To any region but that! Avoid it, camp ye not there!
 Abominations it hath; no day or part of a day
 Is pure and clean. Travel on, spur fast and faster the steeds!
 I tell you that which is known for sure, not tangled in doubt;
 None drawn with cords of untruth inveigle I to his harm."³

(Metre: Wáfir.)

Commandments there be which some minds reckon lightly,
 Yet no man knoweth whom shall befall perdition.
 The Book of Mohammed, ay, and the Book of Moses,
 The Gospel of Mary's son and the Psalms of David,
 Their bans no nation heeded, their wisdom perished
 In vain—and like to perish are all the people.

¹ In Mohammedan law no penalty can be exacted for wounds inflicted by animals.

² I. 57, 9.

³ I. 107, 7.

Two homes hath a man to dwell in, and Life resembles
 A bridge that is travelled over in ceaseless passage¹.
 Behold an abode deserted, a tomb frequented!
 Nor houses nor tombs at last shall remain in being².

(Metre: Tawil.)

Whenever a babe first cries, its parents and kinsfolk say (Tho' mutely), "The darts of Change will fall thick and fast:
 endure!

The world made us miserable, albeit we loved it long:
 Now try it and pass, thou too, thy lifetime in misery.
 And show not as if to thee 'twere nothing, for each of us
 Bears witness that in his heart it wakens a fierce desire."³

Age after age entirely dark hath run
 Nor any dawn led up a rising sun.
 Things change and pass, the world unshaken stands
 With all its western, all its eastern lands.

The Pen flowed and the fiat was fulfilled,
 The ink dried on the parchment as Fate willed.
 Chosroes could his satraps round him save,
 Or Caesar his patricians—from the grave?⁴

(Metre: Tawil.)

Athirsting art thou for Youth's fresh water, and all the while
 Since ever so long ago 'tis sinking and ebbing.
 Thou seest it on the lips of others and canst not take:
 When that that is loved departs, then thou wilt be loathèd⁵.

Life is a bridge between two deaths—'tis crossed
 That moment when the man to life is lost.

² I. 324, 11.³ II. 129, 4.⁴ II. 120, 1. Chosroes (Kisrā) is the Persian and Caesar (Qayṣar) the Byzantine emperor.⁵ II. 59, 3.

(Metre: Tawil.)

(30)

It may be the stars of Night are setting their thought to work
 To make known a mystery, and all eyes shall then behold.
 I came into this abode reluctantly and depart
 Elsewhither against my will: God witnesseth it is so.
 And now in the space 'tween past and future am I compelled
 To action? or have I power and freedom to do my best?
 O World, may I get well rid of thee! for thy folk's one voice
 Is folly, and Moslems match in wickedness those they rule;
 And one puts himself to shame, disclosing his inmost mind,
 And one hides his carnal thoughts—a zealot and bigot he!
 The greybeard is but a child in purpose; the aged crone
 Desires to enjoy her life like any full-bosomed maid.
 Alas, strange it is how run we after a liar's tales
 And leave what we plainly see of foolishness in ourselves.
 These mortals are lost to truth: ascetic there never was Amongst them, and ne'er shall be, until from the dead they rise¹.

(Metre: Tawil.)

(31)

'Tis sorrow enough for man that after he roamed at will,
 The Days beckon him and say, "Begone, enter now a grave!"
 How many a time our feet have trodden beneath the dust
 A brow of the arrogant, a skull of the debonair!²

The world's best moment is a calm hour passed
 In listening to a friend who can talk well.
 How wonderful is Life from first to last!
 Old Time keeps ever young of tooth. There fell
 His ruin upon the nations: in each clime
 Their graves were dug—no grave was digged for Time³.

(Metre: Tawil.)

(33)

To live is the common hope; yet never thou putt'st to proof
 The terrors of Time but when thou verily livest.

¹ I. 242, 9.² I. 214, 9.³ I. 199, 11.

If scattered in disarray the limbs of my body lie,
 In summer let woe betide or winter, I care not.
 Do thou feather, if thou canst, the nest of a needy wight,
 And brag not abroad that thou hast feathered it finely;
 And though unto men thy wealth and opulence overflow,
 Be sure thou shalt sink, O sea, howe'er high thou surgest!¹

(Metre: Kámil.)

(34)

I welcome Death in his onset and the return thereof,
 That he may cover me with his garment's redundancy.
 This world is such an abode that if those present here
 Have their wits entire, they will never weep for the absent ones.
 Calamities exceeding count hath it brought to light;
 Beneath its arm and embosomed close how many more!
 It cleaves us all with its swords asunder and smites us down
 With its spears and finds us out, right home, with its sure-winged shafts.

Its prize-winners, who won the power and the wealth of it,
 Are but little distant in plight from those who lost its prize.

* * * * *

And a strange thing 'tis, how lovingly doth every man
 Desire the Mother of stench the while he rails at her².

(Metre: Tawíl.)

(35)

Softly, my fellow-men! for look, if I blame your ways,
 I needs must, no help for it, begin with my mortal self.
 Oh, when shall Time cease—the power of Allah is over all—
 And we be at rest in earth, hushed everlastingly?
 This body and soul have housed together a period,
 And ever my soul thereby was anguished, her brightness dimmed³.

(Metre: Basít.)

(36)

Sick men, if guided aright, themselves will physic their pain.
 The wise could heal, were they found, or else thou seekest in vain.
 We flee from Death's bitter cup: he follows, loving and fain⁴.

(Metre: Basîlî.)

(37)

For him whose hour is come low in the tomb to be laid
 A house of wood they have redd, a house nor lofty nor wide.
 O ye that mourn, let him be, with Earth alone for his friend:
 No strangeness knows he with her: of comrades trustiest she.
 Earthen the body, and rain the best of gifts to the earth—
 Pray ye the bountiful clouds to keep well-watered his limbs!
 Be youth's cheek never so bright, a strip of dust shall he make,
 And fear surpriseth him when his face grows haggard and wan.
 Whomso the morrow of death from heavy straitness hath freed
 No better fares than a skin dragged to and fro in carouse¹.
 Beware of laughter and shun to live familiar with it:
 Seest not the cloud, when 'twas moved to laugh, how hoarsely it wailed?²

(38)

(Metre: Kâmilî.)

O shapes of men dark-looming under the battle-dust,
 Dyeing red the sword and spurring horses lithe and lean,
 And plunging into the deeps of pitchiest dead of night,
 And ever cleaving through the measureless waste of sand—
 Their hope a little water, that they may lick it up—
 What bitterness do they drain, and all for a boon so cheap!

(39)

'Tis hateful that wail be heard of a weeping mourner
 When cometh mine hour to die and fulfil my doomsday.
 Not willingly went I down to the fated waters:
 The two strong youths⁴ by force haled me between them.
 If choice of my lot were granted, I ne'er had moved house
 To dwell in a place of narrowness after wideness.

¹ Meaning that the winds will blow his dust hither and thither.

³ 1 112, 1.

⁴ Day and Night.

I found all creatures riddled and strung together
By deathbolts rushing hard on the heels of deathbolts.
"Think lightly of this our life" is the charge I give you,
For soon shall I tread the footmarks of my comrades¹.

(40)

Death, an thou wilt come anear me,
Not unwelcome is thy nearing—
Safest, mightiest of strongholds,
Once I pass the grave's portcullis.
Whoso meets thee shall not spy on Peril or forebode affliction.

I am like a camel-owner
Handling all day long the scabbed ones,
Or a wild-bull seeking thistles
Far and wide in wildernesses.
If I fall back to my first source,
'Tis an ill tomb I must lie in.
Every moment as it fleeteth
One more knot of Life unravels.
Who but dreads a doom approaching?
Ay, and who shall fail to drink it?
Well they guard against the sword-edge
Lest their skins should feel its sharpness;
But the agony of deathbed,
Sorer 'tis than thousand stabbings.
Reason wars in us with nature,
Nature makes a hard resistance.

O grave-dweller, thou instruct me
Touching Death and his devices;
Be not niggard, for 'tis certain
I therein am all unpractised.
Wheeling, down on men he swoopeth
As a hawk that hunts a covey,
Or as grim wolf striding swiftly
For a night-raid on the sheepfold.

¹ I. 136, 7.

Ruin spares not any creature
 In the fold or on the field-track,
 Nor 'tis my belief the Dooms pass
 Idly o'er a star-sown region :
 They shall seize on Lyra, Virgo,
 On Arcturus and his consort.
 Every soul do they search after
 In the wide world east and westward,
 Visit ruthlessly of human Kind the alien and the Arab.

Not a lightning-gleam but somewhere
 Wakes a thrill of joy or sorrow.
 Fancy hath enslaved the freeman
 From her toils to flee unwilling.
 Those that seek me shall not find me,
 Far away my camping-places.
 On our crowns erewhile the locks lay
 Jet as 'twere the raven's plumage;
 Then the mirk cleared and we marvelled
 How the pitch-black changed to milk-white.
 When my belly a little dwindles¹,
 I shall count upon God's favour,
 Though provided for the night-march
 Only with a skin of water².

(Metre: Tawîl.)

(41)

If no elder shall be left behind me to feel himself
 Undone by my loss, nor child, for what am I living?
 And Life is a malady whose one medicine is Death,
 So quietly let me go the way to my purpose³.

(Metre: Basîf.)

(42)

Better for Adam and all who issued forth from his loins
 That he and they, yet unborn, created never had been!
 For whilst his body was dust and rotten bones in the earth,
 Ah, did he feel what his children saw and suffered of woe?

What wouldest thou with a house that ne'er is thine to possess,
 Whence, after dwelling a little space, thou goest again?

 And in thy heart the desire thereof—a passionate love.

The spirit's vesture art thou, which afterwards it puts off—
 And vesture moulders away, ay, even armour and mail.
 The Nights, renewing themselves, outwear it: still do they show
 In ever wearing it out the same old treacherous grain.
 But men are different sorts, and he that speaks to them truth
 Is paid with hatred, and he that lies and flatters, with gold.
 Who dirhems hath but a few to falsehood hasteneth soon,
 The tales he feigns and invents make heaps of money for him.
 And oftentimes will a man upbraid himself for his true
 And honest speech, when he sees the luck of fellows that lie¹.

(43)

The World, oh, fie upon her!
 Umm Dafr her name of honour—
 Mother of stink, not scent².
 The dove amongst the sprays there,
 Warbling so well his lays there,
 Hath voice more eloquent (Sages opine) than any
 That preach in pulpit, when he Vows that Time's gifts are many
 And all with poison blent³.

(Metre: Tawil.) (44)

Of each day I take adieu, aware that the like of it,
 Once gone from the like of me, will never return more.
 Ill-starred are the easy ways of life where the careless stroll,
 Howbeit they deem their lot auspicious and happy.

² See note 2, p. 71 supra.

³ I. 136, 2. Cf. I. 81, 8: "I attributed the notes of the dove to the more proper cause, for I did not say, 'It sings,' but I said, 'It weeps and moans.' And this is because happenings are many, and the greater part of them are rough, not kindly."

For me, 'tis as though I ride an old jaded beast, what time
 Outstretched on a bough the lizard basks in the noon-blaze.
 Death journeys amid the night when all friends and foemen sleep,
 And ever afoot is he whilst we are reclining¹.

(Metre: Wáfir.) (45)

O purblind men, is none clear-eyed amongst you?
 Alas, have ye none to guide you towards the summit?
 We people the world in youthtide and in greyness
 Of eld, and in woe we sleep and in woe we waken;
 And all lands we inhabit at every season,
 And find earth's hills the same as we found its valleys.
 A bed is made smooth and soft for the rich man's slumber—
 Oh, gladder for him a grave than a couch to lie on!
 Whenever a soul is joined to a living body,
 Between them is war of Moslem and unbeliever².

(46)

In pleasures is no stay: their sweets beguile
 At first, but ah the bitter after-while!
 Time vowed we all to dust should surely come,
 And sent, to search us out, the messengers of doom.
 Man, once enriched by Death, wants nothing more;
 A child receives Life's breath, and he is poor³.

(Metre: Tawíl.) (47)

Had men followed me—confound them!—well had I guided them
 To Truth or to some plain track by which they might soon arrive.
 For here have I lived until of Time I am tired, and it
 Of me; and my heart hath known the cream of experience.

What choice hath a man except seclusion and loneliness,
 When Destiny grants him not the gaining of that he craves?
 Make peace, if thou wilt, or war: the Days with indifferent hand
 Their measure mete out alike to warrior and friend of peace⁴.

(Metre: Tawîl.)

The wants of my soul keep house, close-curtained, like modest wives,

While other men's wants run loose, like women sent back divorced.

A steed when the bit chafes sore can nowise for all his wrath

Prevail over it except he champ on the iron curb;

And never doth man attain to swim on a full-borne tide

Of glory but after he was sunken in miseries.

It hindereth not my mind from sure expectation of

A mortal event, that I am mortal and mortal's son.

I swerve and they miss their mark, the arrows Life aims at me,

But sped they from bows of Death, not thus would they see me swerve.

The strange camels jealously are driven from the waterside,

But no hand may reach so far to drive from the pond of Death.

I vow, ne'er my watcher watched the storm where should burst its flood,

Nor searched after meadows dim with rain-clouds my pioneer¹.

And how should I hope of Time advantage and increment,

Since even as the branches he destroyed he hath rased the root?²

(Metre: Basîl.)

Sore, sore the barren one's grief: no child conceived she and bare;

Yet that is better for her, with right thought were she but blest.

Death taketh naught from a lonely soul excepting itself,

Whenas he musters his might and of a sudden waylays.

Alas, the crier of good—no ear inclineth to him:

Good, since the world was, hath been a lost thing ever unsought³.

(50)

(Metre: Tawîl.)

Each time had its turn of me—a morning, an eve, a night—

And over me passed To-day, To-morrow, and Yesterday.

In splendour upsprings a day, then blindingly creeps a mirk,

A moon rises full and sets, then followeth it a sun.

² I. 277, 10.

³ I. 271, 8.

I go from the world, farewell unspoken, without a word
 Of peace on my lips, for oh, its happenings are hunger-pangs.
 Abstainer in two respects am I, never having touched
 A woman of swelling breast or kissed pilgrim-wise the Stone.

* * * * *

And now I have lived to cross the border of fifty years,
 Albeit enough for me in hardship were ten or five.
 And if as a shadow they are gone, yet they also seem Like heaped spoils, whereof no fifth for Allah was set apart.
 The bale must on camel's back be corded, the world be loathed,
 The body be laid in earth, the trace and the track be lost.
 Make haste, O my heart, make haste, repenting, to do the deeds
 Of righteousness—know'st thou not the grave is my journey's end?
 And sometimes I speak out loud and sometimes I whisper low :
 In sight of the One 'tis all the same, whether low or loud.
 And still with adventurous soul I dive in the sea of Change,
 But only to drown, alas, or ever I clutch its pearl¹.

(51)

'Tis pain to live and pain to die,
 Oh, would that far-off fate were nigh !
 An empty hand, a palate dry,
 A craving soul, a staring eye.

Who kindles fires in the night
 For glory's sake he shows a light ;
 But man, to live, needs little wealth—
 A shirt, a bellyful, and health.

Clasped in the tomb, he careth not
 For anything he gave or got ;
 Silken touch and iron thrust
 Are one to him that now is dust.

* * * * *

We smile on happy friends awhile,
 Though nothing here is worth a smile.
 Give joy to those, more blest than I,
 Who gained their dearest wish—to die²!

So soon as they put me out of sight, I shall reck no more
 When over me sweeps in gusts a northwind or southwind.
 Time's ruinous strokes will fall: I cannot preserve my bones
 By getting myself a chest of cypress or pinewood.
 I wonder, will frightful hordes of Ethiops and Nubians
 Because of the wrongs I did be seen at my rest-place?
 Will colour of sin endow the white-gleaming dust above
 With that noble wannish hue of piety's champions?
 "How many a pillowing skull of mortals and cradling side,"
 Says Earth, "turned to rottenness and crumbled beneath me!"
 And lo, though I wrought no good to speak of, I surely hope
 My drouth will be quenched at last in amplest of buckets¹.

(53)

If Time aids thee to victory, he will aid
 Thy foe anon to take a full revenge.
 The Days' meridian heats bear off as spoil
 That which was shed from the moist dawns gone by².

(54)

Earth's lap me rids in any case
 Of all the ills upon her face,
 And equally 'twixt lord and slave
 Divides the portion of the grave.
 A long, long time have I lived through,
 And never by experience knew
 That we can hear the step so light
 Of angel or demonic sprite.
 To God the kingdom over all;
 For they, the greater as the small—
 The living as the dead—remain,
 And nothing perishes in vain.
 Lo, if a body dies, in store
 This earth will keep it evermore;
 And at a sign of parting given
 The soul already is in heaven³.

Upon the hazard of Life doth man come into the world
 Against his will, and departs a loser chafed and chagrined.

 As though the crown of his head were ne'er with hoariness sown¹.

(Metre: Tawîl.)

(56)

A bird darted on my left, but augury I practise not,
 Howbeit its flight may send me somewhat of evil chance.
 I see that from every race continually mounteth up
 A babble of delirium, both the long and the short of it;
 That piecemeal and limb by limb the body returns to earth,
 But as for the spirit, none well knows whither that is gone.
 And surely one day shall we, of utter necessity,
 Set out on a hateful road at morning or eventide.
 If base souls were reconciled with noble, their common wounds
 Forgiveness had healed, not law that punishes like with like².

(57)

Consider every moment past
 A thread from Life's frayed mantle cast.
 Bear with the world that shakes thy breast
 And live serene as though at rest.
 How often did a coal of fire
 Blaze up awhile, sink low, expire!
 O captain, with calm mind lead on,
 Where rolls the dust of war: 'tis none
 Of thine, the cause that's lost or won³.
 Time, who gave thee so scant a dole,
 He takes of human lives large toll.
 Spare us more wounds: enough we owe
 A fate enamoured of our woe.

Aweary am I of living in town and village—
 And oh, to be camped alone in a desert region,
 Revived by the scent of lavender when I hunger
 And scooping into my palm, if I thirst, well-water!
 Meseemeth, the Days are dromedaries lean and jaded
 That bear on their backs humanity travelling onward;
 They shrink not in dread from any portentous nightmare,
 Nor quail at the noise of shouting and rush of panic,
 But journey along for ever with those they carry,
 Until at the last they kneel by the dug-out houses.
 No need, when in earth the maid rests covered over,
 No need for her locks of hair to be loosed and plaited;
 The young man parts from her, and his tears are flowing—
 Even thus do the favours flow of disgustful Fortune².

(59)

The nature mingled with the souls of men
 Against their reason fights, and breaks it so
 That now its lustre seems of no avail,
 A sun palled o'er with clouds and shadows dark,
 Until, when death approaches, they perceive
 That all they wrought is foolishness and vain.

A knave may go abroad and seal his fate,
 As when the viper sallies from its hole;
 Or stay at home to die by slow degrees,

The Imám, he knows—'tis no ill thought of mine—
 The missionaries work for place and power⁴.
 In the air a myriad floating atoms shine,
 But sink to rest in the passing of an hour.
 There lives no man distinct from his fellows: all
 One general kind, their bodies to earth akin;
 And sure the hidden savour of honey is gall—
 Confound thee! how thy fool tongue licks it in!
 Thronged cities shall turn to desolate sands again
 And the vast wilderness be choked with men⁵.

¹ II. 183, 4.² II. 180, 12.³ I. 93, 6.

⁴ The Imám is the leader of a religious sect or community, while the missionaries (dd'í, plural du'át) are those who carry on propaganda and endeavour to increase the number of his adherents. Professor Browne (Literary History of Persia, vol. I p. 410 foll.) gives an interesting account of the methods employed by the Ismá'ili dd'ís, to whom Ma'arri is referring here.

 When earth shall be cast upon the grave that is dug for you.
 For reason it thus: if now this body is surely vile
 Before dissolution, worse and viler the coward's act.
 I ride on the shoulders of mine hours, and fain would I
 Have tarried, but never Time's departure is tarrying.
 May God punish Day and Night! They hold me in dire suspense:
 By two threads I seem to hang—the threads of a thing of naught.
 My life, when it comes to birth and hastens towards decay,

The holy fights by Moslem heroes fought,
 The saintly works by Christian hermits wrought
 And those of Jewry or of Sabian creed—
 Their valour reaches not the Indian's deed
 Whom zeal and awe religiously inspire
 To cast his body on the flaming pyre.
 Yet is man's death a long, long sleep of lead¹
 And all his life a waking. O'er our dead
 The prayers are chanted, hopeless farewells ta'en;
 And there we lie, never to stir again.

Yes: one part of good is there in many a thousand parts,
And when we have found it, those that follow are evil.
Our riches and poverty, precaution and heedlessness
And glory and shame—'tis all a cheat and illusion.
Encompassed are we by Space, which cannot remove from us,

At first, then the months which follow each after other;

Our bodies of dust, they quake with a doubt uneasy
 When, ceasing from all unrest, long-wandering mortals
 Are ware of return to Earth, who of kin is nearest—Best healer of pain, tho' sound as a crow's their health be.
 For lo, to the clouds they soar in a vain ambition,
 And tumble with souls athrill to the chase of honour,
 And spears in the clash are shivered and swords are dunted.
 For dross they would die; yet he that complains of hunger,
 He wants but a little food; or of thirst, but water.
 Nobility's nature base blood hath corrupted:
 Cross-breeding will mar the stock of a noble stallion.
 And kings in their wealth deep wallow, but comes a suitor
 Their bounty to taste, they prove a mirage deluding;
 And sometimes ravin goads from his lair the lion
 To prowl all night in sheepcote and camel-shelter.
 If Fate's stern hand on high ne'er trembles, surely Thy trembling in hope or fear will avail thee nothing².

(81)

Nor glory nor dishonour sundereth
 Moses and Pharaoh in the hour of death—
 Death, like a shivering crone who feeds a flame
 With lote and laurel, for 'tis all the same;
 A lioness that drags into her cave
 Her slaughtered prey, the freeman and the slave, Launching them piecemeal both with tongue and paw
 Into wide-opened all-devouring maw⁴.

¹ 1. 72, 8. The literal translation of the last couplet is: "This one returns with (the letters) 'ayn and záy (= 'izz, glory), and that one with (the letters) dād and rá (= durr, pain).

² This refers to the well-known verses by Umayya b. Abi 'l-Ṣalt (ed. by Schulthess, No. 25, vv. 46-47):

"And at the end of every night the sun rises red, his colour turning to rose.
 He does not rise for them willingly, But only when he is chastised and beaten."

The next verse was evidently suggested by a verse of Umayya which is quoted in the Lisán, vi. 50, 18.

Untruth ran from sire to son amongst them: the sage alone
 According to knowledge speaks, not after the ancients.

And Life is a she-camel that bears far across the sands
 An emigrant weeping sore for that which he suffers;

 Its sickness, he labours long and meanwhile himself falls sick;

² I. 305, 11. The pre-Islamic Arabs believed that the ghost or wraith of the dead man hovered over his grave in the shape of an owl (háma). Here the poet's meaning seems to be that he has rid himself of ignorance and superstition except in one particular: his life is still haunted by the fear of death.

³ Literally, "let her (thy wife) be barren."

A dawn and a dark that seem—what signify else their hues
Alternate?—as stripes of white and black on a venom'd snake;
And Time's universal voice commanding that they sit down
Who stood on their feet, and those who sate, that they now up-stand.

HUMAN SOCIETY.

"It may be thou wilt abide in Paradise hereafter; at any rate in quitting this world thou hast escaped from Hell²." Would the poet have found life so painful if he had not been blind, poor³, and disappointed in his hopes, and if the conditions of the age had been less deplorable than they were? Possibly; for we know that pessimism may spring from temperament or from philosophical reflection, and that a man's state of mind and feeling need not depend at all on the circumstances in which he lives. To grant this, however, is far from justifying the inference that Ma'arri's private misfortunes and his consciousness of public ills had nothing to do with his philosophy of life. The former, culminating in his failure at Baghdád, caused him to feel that solitude was the only tolerable alternative to non-existence, while the latter confirmed him in the belief that all mankind are fools, knaves, liars, and hypocrites, or vented itself in denunciation of particular classes and professions. His contemporaries were not so uniformly black as he painted them, but since understanding comes before criticism, let us consider for a moment what was the general situation of the Moslem empire and especially of Syria during the last quarter of the tenth and the first half of the eleventh century A.D.

¹ Luzûm, II. 42, II. ² Ibid. II. 322, 8; cf. I. 317, II; II. 68, 4; 324, II.

³ During the earlier part of his life. In the period following his return from Baghdád he seems to have been comparatively well off. Cf. the last paragraph of this section.

The 'Abbásid Caliphs had long ceased to govern¹, though their spiritual authority was acknowledged by most of the independent princes who supplanted them. In Baghdád the Buwayhids, a Persian dynasty, held absolute sway; and while they extended their power over western and southern Persia, another Persian house, the Sámánids, maintained themselves in Khurásán and Transoxania until they were dispossessed by the Turkish Ghaznevids. Ma'arrí did not live to see the western advance of the Seljúqs, who had occupied Baghdád in A.D. 1055, three years before his death; Aleppo and Damascus fell into their hands about fifty years later. For him the political storm-centre was Cairo, which since its foundation in A.D. 969 had been the capital of the Fátimid dynasty. The Fátimids, according to their own story, stood in the direct line of descent from the Prophet through his daughter Fátima; consequently they regarded the 'Abbásid Caliphs (who descended from the Prophet's uncle) as usurpers and claimed the title and prerogatives of the Caliphate by right divine. Their real ancestor was 'Abdulláh ibn Maymún al-Qaddáh, the son of a Persian oculist. He belonged to the Ismá'ílí sect, a branch of the Shí'ites which recognises seven Imáms, or pontiffs, of the Prophet's House, the last of these being Muḥammad ibn Ismá'il (ob. circa A.D. 770). Exploiting the Shí'ite belief that the Imám, although he may vanish and remain hidden for a time, will one day return to fill the earth with justice, 'Abdulláh set a vast conspiracy in train. His methods of propaganda have been described as grotesque, audacious, and satanic; but whatever we think of their morality, we must be profoundly impressed by the genius displayed in them². In A.D. 909, thirty-four years after the death of 'Abdulláh ibn Maymún, his grandson appeared amongst the Berbers of North Africa, announcing himself under the name of 'Ubaydulláh as the promised Mahdí and giving out that he was a descendant of the Imám Muḥammad ibn Ismá'íl. This 'Ubaydulláh founded the Fátimid dynasty in Tunis, and his successors, advancing eastward, conquered Egypt and Syria as far as Damascus (A.D. 969-70). If the rule of the Fátimids "was on the whole, despite occasional acts of cruelty and violence inevitable in that time and place, liberal, beneficent, and favourable to learning¹," the Ismá'ílí doctrines bore other fruit which was deadly enough to excuse the worst construction that could be put upon them. I refer to the Carmathians and the so-called Assassins. During the tenth century the Carmathians (Qarāmiṭa)—originally the followers of an Ismá'ílí missionary, Ḥamdán Qarmaṭ—ravaged, plundered, and massacred in many lands of Islam; in A.D. 930 they even sacked Mecca and carried off the Black Stone from the Ka'ba. They paid a somewhat inconstant homage to the Fátimid Caliphs, whose secret diplomacy used them for its own ends and directed their operations, though the alliance was disavowed officially.

At the date of Ma'arri's birth northern Syria, including Aleppo and Ma'arra, was held by a successor of the famous Ḥamdánid prince, Sayfu 'l-Dawla; but the Fátimids were already beginning to threaten it from the south. The struggle went on with varying fortune for about ninety years. It raged most fiercely round Aleppo, which passed to and fro from the Ḥamdánids to the Fátimids and from the Fátimids to a Bedouin dynasty, the Banú Mirdás. On one occasion the Ḥamdánid Abu 'l-Faḍá'il "endeavoured to obtain the help of the Greek emperor against the Egyptian invaders, and such help was readily given, since the maintenance of Antioch in Christian hands depended on the possibility of playing off one Moslem power against the other. Aleppo after a siege of thirteen months by 'Azíz's general was set free by the timely aid of the Emperor Basil²." Thus Ma'arri lived all his life in the shadow of war and was familiar with its horrors and miseries. Once at least he came forward as peace-maker. The historian al-Qiftí relates that in A.D. 1027, when Šálih ibn Mirdás, the governor of Aleppo, besieged Ma'arra and bombarded it with a catapult (manjanīq), the terrified inhabitants implored Ma'arrī to intercede with him. "Abu 'l-'Alā went forth, leaning on a guide. Šāliḥ was told that the gate of the town had been thrown open and that a blind man was being led out. He gave orders to cease fighting. 'It is Abu 'l-'Alā,' said he: 'let us see what he wants.' He received the poet courteously, granted his request, and asked him to recite some poetry. Abu 'l-'Alā improvised a few verses which occur in the *Luzūmiyyāt*¹." Another version of the incident is not so picturesque but seems more probable. Šāliḥ had arrested seventy notables of Ma'arra, and Abu 'l-'Alā was sent to plead for their release, a task which he successfully accomplished².

The prevailing anarchy fostered social and economic disorders of the gravest kind, and these in turn provoked fresh outbreaks of lawlessness. Here are some extracts from the annals of this period: they may help the reader to imagine what it was like.

Anno 982-3: It is said that on account of the civil wars between the 'Abbāsīd and the Fāṭimid Caliphs no one made the pilgrimage from 'Irāq (to Mecca) during the years 982-90. There were no pilgrims from 'Irāq in the years 1002, 1008, 1010, 1017-21, etc., etc. Bands of Carmathians and Bedouins infested the caravan routes, robbing travellers or levying

I remained in seclusion a long while, unblamed and unenvied.

When all but the least part of my life had passed, and my soul was doomed to quit the body (soon),

I was sent as an intercessor to Šāliḥ—and the plan of my fellow-townsmen was a bad one;

For he heard from me the cooing of a dove, and I heard from him the roaring of a lion.

Let me not be pleased with this hypocrisy: how often does an hour of tribulation make dear what was cheap before! (i.e. if my fellow-citizens honoured me, it was only from self-interest: they thought I could serve them in a crisis).

² The events which caused Ma'arrī to undertake this mission are related by Professor Margoliouth in his Introduction to the Letters of Abu 'l-'Alā, p. 33; cf. Luzūm, I. 355, 14 foll. If Šāliḥ really besieged Ma'arra, we must suppose that the town had revolted against him in consequence of his tyrannical act. The Luzūm makes no allusion to a siege.

blackmail. A certain Badr ibn Ḥasanawayh paid 5000 dínars every year to the brigand al-Uṣayfir "as compensation for what he used to take from the pilgrims." In 998 the caravan from 'Irāq was intercepted by Abu 'l-Jarrāḥ al-Ṭā'í, who demanded 9000 dínars from Raḍí and Murtaḍá, the Sharífs of Baghdád, before he would allow it to proceed¹.

Anno 983-4: The price of wheat in 'Irāq rose to an enormous figure, and "a great number of people died of hunger on the road." In 992 at Baghdád a pound of bread cost 40 dirhems, and a walnut 1 dirhem. In 1047 Mosul, Mesopotamia, and Baghdád were devastated by famine and pestilence: the number of dead reached 300,000. In 1056 (a year or two before Ma'arrí's death) "plague and famine spread over Baghdád, Syria, and Egypt and the whole world, and the people were eating their dead²."

Anno 1009: Abú 'Abdallah al-Qummí al-Miṣrī the cloth-merchant died, leaving a fortune of one million dínars, exclusive of goods, merchandise, and jewels³.

Anno 1002-3: An earthquake destroyed multitudes in the 'Awāṣim (the province to which Ma'arra belonged) and the frontier lands of Syria. In 1033-4 a third part of Ramla was demolished by an earthquake: "the sea ebbed to a distance of three farsakhs (about nine miles), and the people went down to fish; then it rolled back upon them and all who could not swim were drowned." During Ma'arrí's lifetime there were similar disasters at Dínawar, Tabríz, Tadmor, and Baalbec⁴.

It would be tedious to lengthen this list by giving details, for example, of the bloody religious conflicts in Baghdád and 'Irāq, where authority was divided between a Sunnite Pope and a Shí'ite Emperor. Of course, such records mean little unless we can regard them as typical. The present case, I think, fulfils that condition in the sense that the symptoms noted above were not isolated or sporadic but continually recurred and affected the welfare of whole provinces and populations. Concerning the deeper causes of the disease—slavery, polygamy, the decay of religion, the unequal distribution of wealth, etc.—we learn more from Ma'arrí than from the Moslem chronicles.

Literature does not always flourish under a strong central government or languish under a weak one. The damage inflicted by the break-up of the 'Abbásid Caliphate was to a great extent repaired by the dynasties which succeeded it. The courts of Aleppo, Bukhárá, Ghazna, and other cities became rival seats of literary culture. Every prince gathered poets and scholars around him, if not for love of learning—and this was no rarity—then in order to gratify his self-esteem and assure his prestige. Islamic literature, hitherto confined to the language of the Koran, was enriched by Persians writing in their own tongue. It is true that as science and philosophy developed, poetry and literature declined: the genius of the age was constructive rather than creative, and the materials with which its writers worked were largely foreign. From that standpoint we may call it decadent if we please; but though it lacked the brilliance of the epoch which expired with Sayfu 'l-Dawla seven years before Ma'arrí was born, it produced many authors of distinction and some of world-wide fame. Our poet numbered among his contemporaries Firdawsí and Avicenna; Bírúní, the historian of India, 'Utbí, the biographer of Sultan Maḥmúd, and Badí'u 'l-Zamán al-Hamadhání, inventor of a new form of romance which was brought to perfection by Ḥarírí; the scholastic theologians Báqilání and Ibn Ḥazm, the critic Ibn Rashíq, the anthologist Tha'álibí, and the defender of orthodox Šúfism Abu 'l-Qásim al-Qushayrí.

The Luzúm contains several references to political affairs in Syria and elsewhere. In the following poem Ma'arrí laments the fatal blow dealt to the house of 'Abbás by the Buwayhid occupation of Baghdád (A.D. 945-1055).

Von Kremer (op. cit., p. 60) misunderstands this passage and attributes to Ma'arri the belief in a man of blood and iron, who alone could re-establish order and security ("in einem Manne, der mit 'Blut und Eisen' wieder die Ordnung herstellt"). The second couplet certainly expresses such a belief, but it forms part of the prediction which Ma'arri means to discredit. The world-saviour, the man of the mailed fist, is the Carmathian Imám—the last person our poet expected or desired to see, though the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in A.D. 1047 raised high hopes of his advent¹. Let me quote a parallel passage:

(III)

And there shall rise amongst mankind a king
 Like to an angel that torments the wicked,
 His hands cunning to slaughter: he shall smite
 With the cold iron adversaries all.
 They said, "A just Imám shall come to rule us
 And shoot our enemies with a piercing shaft."
 This earth, the home of mischief and despite,
 Did never yield a single day's delight².

There speaks the pessimist, taught by hard experience that "Man never is, but always to be, blest."

While Ma'arri has nothing to say either for or against the Fátimid government as such, he denounces fanaticism wherever he finds it; and in his country and age it was rampant everywhere—"men (he observes) take the opposite direction to Right: they are extreme Shí'ites or bigoted Sunnis³." Alluding to the Caliph Ḥákim, who pretended to be an incarnation of God, he declares that the worst of mankind is a monarch who wishes his subjects to worship him⁴. The Carmathians are bitterly attacked for their impiety and immorality. We do not know how far Ma'arri's description of their tenets is trustworthy: in the Risālatu 'l-Ghufrān, where he relates many anecdotes concerning this detested sect¹, he mentions that his information was partly derived from those who had travelled in districts under Carmathian rule.

² The text has "Musallam" or "Musallim." I read "Musaylim," an abbreviation of Musaylima, the false prophet, whose doctrines resembled those which are here ascribed to the Carmathians. The curtailed form of his name occurs in a Persian poem by 'Unsuri (Dawlatshāh, Tadhkiratu 'sh-Shu'arā, ed. by E. G. Browne, p. 46, l. 8).

³ I.e. an imitator of others. According to Ma'arri, the mass of mankind are enslaved by habit and tradition.

Ye treated the Koran with contempt when it came to you, and paid no heed to the Fast and the canonical prayers.

Ye expected an Imám, a misguided one, to appear at the conjunction of the planets; and when it passed, ye said, "(His coming is put off) for a few years¹."

There is no evidence that Ma'arrí was acquainted with the higher teaching of the Ismá'ílís; and although it has been called "*une espèce de culte de la raison*²," we can feel sure that, so far as it preserved any positive character, it would have been entirely repugnant to him. Most of the poems in which they are mentioned lay stress on their violations of law and religion, but he also charges them with revolutionary aims—"the desire, namely, to destroy the power of the Arabs and the religion of Islam whence that power was derived³."

Whenever ye see a band of Hajarites⁴, their advice to the people is,
"Forsake the mosques!"

Time hides a secret which (when it is disclosed) will suddenly put to sleep all who are awake or arouse all who slumber.

They say that the influence of the conjunction of the planets will ruin the religious institutions established by the noblest leaders of men,

And that, when the heavenly fate descends, the spear of the armed champion (of Islam) will produce no more effect (on his enemies) than motes in a sunbeam.

If Islam has been overtaken by calamities which lowered its prestige, yet none ever saw the like of it⁵.

And if they revere Saturn, I revere One of whom Saturn is the most ancient worshipper⁶.

¹ Luzúm, I. 182, 5. For some time before A.D. 1047 it was proclaimed that the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in that year would mark the final triumph of the Fátimids over the 'Abbásids. Cf. Luzúm, II. 129, 8-9 translated in my Lit. Hist. of the Arabs, p. 322).

⁵ These are the words of a patriotic Moslem. Von Kremer's rendering, "none ever saw a calamity like this (Carmathian) one" (ZDMG. vol. 38, p. 500) seems inadmissible.

The religions of every people have come down to us after a system which they themselves contrived.

And some of them altered the doctrines of others, and intelligent minds perceived the falsity of that which they affirmed to be true.

Do not rejoice when thou art honoured amongst them, for oft have they exalted a base man and held him in honour.

The external rites of Islam have been changed by a sect who sought to wound it and lopped away its branches.

And what they have spoken is (only) the prelude to a great event, as poets begin their encomia with love-songs;

For it is rumoured that on a certain day they that lie buried in the earth shall arise¹.

With one exception, which will be noticed presently, our author's general views on government are quite orthodox.

(115)

Fear kings and willingly yield obedience to them, for the king is a rain-cloud that waters the earth.

If they are unjust, yet they are of great use to society: how often have they defended thee with infantry and cavalry!

And did the emperors of Persia and the princes of Ghassân abstain from tyranny and oppression aforetime?

Horses set free to graze go their own way: nothing holds them in check but bridles, which gall them, and reins².

(116)

Sovereignty is fire: beneficial, if moderate, but harmful and consuming, if it transgress.

And nearness to it is the sea: if it bring thee gain, yet there is danger of death by drowning³.

It is not remarkable that an Oriental writer should plead for just and rational government⁴ or point out that kings have duties as well as rights; but unless I am mistaken,

¹ II. 404, 2. Cf. II. 427, 3: "They expected that an Imâm would arise to abrogate the law laid down by the Prophet."

² II. 371, 1.

⁴ Cf. II. 21, 4.

Ma'arri is alone in anticipating the modern democratic theory that the heads of the state are its paid servants.

(117)

My stay (in the world) is wearisome: how long shall I associate with a people whose princes command what is not good for it?

They wronged their subjects and allowed themselves to deceive them and neglected their interests, although they are their hirelings¹.

(Metre: Tawil.)

If well we consider things, they surely disclose to us
Their secret: the people's prince is servant of those he rules².

(119)

Leave mankind to do as they please, for if thou look'st, (thou wilt see that) their king resembles a hired slave, who returned (from his work) in the evening.

The shade of acacia-trees whither thou resortest for shelter makes thee independent of him that asks gold in payment of the house (thou dwellest in) and the stones (with which it is built)³.

In two of these passages (Nos. 118 and 119) the maxim rex servus populi is used as an argument for asceticism. The poor hermit enjoys greater happiness and freedom than the most powerful monarch.

Ma'arri spares none of the ruling classes, and we cannot but wonder how such a contemptuous and outspoken critic escaped punishment. His lash falls cuttingly on princes and military governors, but with particular severity on the 'ulamá', that is to say, on those who represent the legal and religious authority in the Moslem state.

They guide affairs the way of fools;
Their power ends, another rules.
Oh, fie on life and fie on me
And this ignoble sovereignty!⁴

(121)

'Tis sadness enough that all the righteous are gone together and that we are left alone to inhabit the earth.
 Truly, for a long while 'Irâq and Syria have been two ciphers: the king's power in them is an empty name¹.
 The people are ruled by devils invested with absolute authority:
 in every land there is a devil in the shape of a governor—
 One who does not care though all the folk starve, if he can pass the night drinking wine with his belly full².

(122)

Never the cup rested idle in the cupbearer's hand,
 But when thy bloated paunch was threatening to burst.
 In the morning ankle-wise juts out thy belly,
 Drink-swollen, thy head with riot split like a mazard³.

(Metre: Tawîl.)

(123)

Cleave thou to the act and deed of virtue, were all it brings
 Of vantage to thee at last its fair sound in ears of men.
 So sure as thou liv'st, there's none that flees from the world in sooth,
 Not even the eremites of Christendom in their cells.
 The princes of humankind are worser than all the rest,
 When like unto hovering hawks they swoop down and snatch their prey.
 A ruler in every land: if one by God's help goes straight,
 Another perverts the course of justice to vilest ends.
 The property he by fraud removes from its rightful hands—
 Then burst forth in overflow the waters of weeping eyes;
 Around him a legal crew with visages bleak as crags
 Which never were softer made by plenteously-gushing rains⁴.

Ma'arri's opinion of the 'ulamâ' (Moslem divines) is briefly expressed in the verse—

With wakeful grief the pondering mind must scan Religion made to serve the pelf of Man—⁵ and is best illustrated by the poems which give us his views on that subject. Meanwhile a few specimens may find a place here.

Who knows? Some that fill the mosque with terror whene'er they preach

No better may be than some that drink to a tavern-tune.

If God's public worship serve them only to engine fraud,

Then nearer to Him are those forsaking it purposely.

Let none vaunt himself who soon returns to an element

Of clay which the potter takes and cunningly moulds for use.

A vessel, if so it hap, anon will be made of him,

From whence any common churl at pleasure may eat and drink;

And he, unaware the while, transported from land to land—

The lay professions are not forgotten. At the head of those who prey on human folly and superstition come the astrologers; and of them Ma'arrí speaks with an indignation corresponding to the almost universal faith in their predictions and to the very important part which they played in Moslem life, both public and private⁶.

¹ II. 202, 2. Cf. Koran, 22, 2: "(on the Last Day) every woman who giveth suck shall forget the infant which she suckleth." Ma'arrí describes the popular preachers (quṣṣāṣ) as corruptors of the true religion and demands that stern measures should be taken to suppress them (II. 77, 5 foll.).

² With manifest irony the poet uses here the word ḥabr, which properly denotes a non-Moslem doctor of divinity.

³ I.e. he does nothing new or extraordinary.

(131)

Could I command obedience, never in life
 Astrologer had shamed the causeway's crown.
 Be he blind churl or keen-eyed reprobate,
 From him pours falsehood without stint or stay.
 He with his arrows gets to work betimes¹
 And turns his astrolabe and tells a fortune.
 The foolish woman stopped, and 'twas as though,
 Stopping, she rushed into a lion's den.
 She asks him questions—of a husband changed
 Towards her: he starts writing with *riqân*²
 In characters distinct. "Thy name?" quoth he,
 "Ay, and thy mother's? Verily, I can Expound by cogitation things unseen."
 He swears the genies do frequent his house,
 Submissive one and all, whether they speak
 Clear Arabic or barbarous gibberish.
 This fellow plies his craft in many a land,
 The while at home his wife eats food she loathes.
 What! hath a man no means of livelihood
 Except the morsels thrown him by the stars?
 To pelt o'er deserts with a caravan
 Is trade more honourable than gains like these
 Of one who, were he stoned, would justly die.
 Ah me, the thoughts that boil within my breast!
 I keep them close and simmering under lid.
 'Tis marvellous, when the rack has done its worst,
 The miscreant with drawn and tongueless mouth
 Recants not ever. What escape for us?
 Earth is a raging sea, the sky o'erflowing
 With cloudbursts of calamity, the time
 Corrupt: nor truth puts out a first spring-leaf
 Amongst mankind, nor error fades away.
 Saddle and bridle, that thou quick mayst flee:
 They all are saddled and bridled for thine harm.
 And bright is Good, but thither hasteneth none;
 And dark is Ill, and thence doth none retire.
 They smile upon thee if thou bring'st them lies;

¹ Arrows were used in playing games of hazard.² Henna or saffron.

Speak truth and lo, they furiously fling stones.
 Thy sourness unto them defends thee from them :
 Whene'er thou art sweet, they run at thee to bite¹.

(132)

She is gone out early in her boots and mantle to consult the blind astrologer;
 But he cannot tell her what she wants to know, for he is ignorant, nor has he wit enough to make a guess.
 "To-morrow," says he, "or afterwards there will be a steady fall of rain: if it pour abundantly, it will be a great help."
 He induces the blockheads of the quarter to believe that he can read the secrets of the unseen world,
 Although, if they asked him about something on his own breast²,
 he would answer falsely or mutter in silence³.

(133)

She questioned her astrologer about
 The child in cradle—"How long will it live?"
 "A hundred years," cries he, to earn a drachma,
 And death came to her boy within the month.
 Changed times! when fair young women seek a husband,
 Offering high sums to furnish his due dower⁴.

The fool dislikes his daughters, though his son
 Brings worse destruction than his son-in-law.
 I view as man's most bitter enemy
 A son, the proper issue of his loins,
 Howbeit in his folly he believes
 The mares outmatched in racing by his colt⁵.

Astrology, of course, ranked as a science and was often practised by celebrated Moslem astronomers, but the "astrologers" to whom Ma'arri refers are evidently vulgar fortune-tellers and impostors of evil reputation⁶, who seem to have found their clientèle chiefly in the more credulous sex. The type is familiar and not without variety.

 flattered?—

Laying a snare for the prodigal youth or e'er he grow wiser¹.

(135)

Over the earth from land to land you drifted,
 Some yielding more of bounty's rain, some less;
 Against the yelping curs your staff you lifted,
 Amazed were they at your stout-heartedness.
 You dearly wished for each man's wealth and fortune,
 And none so base to wish for yours was found;
 You stopped at every doorway to importune,
 Till Abú Dábiṭ² drove you—underground³.

 It none the less lies open for receipts⁵.

² Death. This kunya, which has the force of an epithet and signifies one who lays violent hands on his victims and holds them fast, is said (according to the commentator here) to be "a name for Death in the language of the Abyssinians." Mr McLean, however, writes to me: "Ethiopic has the verb ፀለጠ (= ፀለ) in the sense of 'take firm hold of,' 'seize.'...But I cannot find trace of any compound with aba ('father of') similar to the one you cite in Arabic. Such expressions are comparatively uncommon in Ethiopic."

O sons of Learning, ever were ye lured
By rhetoric empty as the buzz of flies.
Your poets are very wolves—the robber's way
They take in panegyric and love-song,
Doing their friends worse injury than foes;
And when they verses write, out-thieve the rat.
I lend you praise repaid with praise as false,
Whence 'tis as though between us taunts had passed.
Shall I let run to waste my time of eld
Amongst you, squandered like my days of youth?

Fine eloquence I do cast off from my tongue,
Resigning to the Arabs who have wit
Base occupations uncommendable,
Whereof the whole return is utter loss.
Leave me, that I may babble in vain no more
But, waiting Death, close on myself my door².

The Luzûm throws many a side-light on the state of contemporary Moslem society. Granted that the author is an ascetic as well as a pessimist, the corruption which he describes was real and deeply rooted, though less extensive than his poems suggest. Wine-drinking³ and female luxury⁴ are favourite topics. He condemns polygamy as being an injustice to the wives⁵ and is fully aware of the evils which flow from it. Family life was embittered. Harems filled with foreign slaves produced a hybrid race, adding new vices to the old⁶. The Arabs no longer ruled, the Arabic language had become debased¹; the influence of Jews and Christians was such that often a Moslem would place himself under their protection. As for religion, even its outward forms had fallen into contempt. References to some of these points are given below, while others are illustrated by the following poems or the parts of them printed in italics.

Live a miser like the rest of us in these degenerate days,
And pretend to be a churl, for lo, the world hath churlish ways.

O children of Earth, there's not a man blest with righteousness
 Below ground nor any save a rascal above it.
 Was Adam, your ancestor, so noble in what he wrought,

 The words of the messengers ye hear not, unheeding?⁴

 But walks in deserts to increase his gain⁵.

We gather from these passages that Ma'arri not only regarded human nature as evil but mankind in the mass as incorrigible and incapable of practising the virtues on which the utility of social intercourse depends. "You must choose," he says, "either a solitude like death or the company of hypocrites¹." He himself fell far short of the complete seclusion advertised in his letter to the people of Ma'arra², and it is interesting to come across poems which tell us what his neighbours thought of him and he of them, how he disliked mutual compliments, how he talked to his visitors from Persia and Arabia, and so forth. He confesses that the truth cannot be spoken in society without giving offence and that he felt obliged to behave as every one else did³.

 The whole world's religion too is but simulation.
 And often a man belies the thought of his dearest friend,

 If Allah they worship not—my people—with faith entire,
 Him only, I cut myself clean off from my people⁴.

This, though probably an exaggeration, is more credible than the same writer's statement that the affairs of the town were administered by Abu 'l-'Alá and his agents.

received considerable fees from the students who came in crowds to hear him, and his letters show him "in the character of a liberal man, helping persons of his own rank with gifts¹." When he speaks of himself as poor and lets us know that in spite of his poverty he had often declined the presents which his friends offered to him², that is only the pessimist's self-indulgence and the ascetic's self-denial. We can believe that the demands made upon his charity justified him in protesting that he was not what rumour declared him to be³.

III.

ASCETICISM.

Ma'arri's "confinement to his house⁴" was his revenge upon a world which rejected him. It was not a spontaneous act of virtue: Fortune held up to his lips no enticing cup that he might thrust it away. When he said, "I'll play no more," he knew that he had already lost the game.

What choice hath a man except seclusion and loneliness,

When Destiny grants him not the gaining of that he craves?⁵

He is honest enough to disclaim the merit of renunciation.

Men of acute mind call me an ascetic, but they are wrong in their diagnosis. Although I disciplined my desires, I only abandoned worldly pleasures because the best of these withdrew themselves from me⁶.

This, however, is not the whole truth. Other motives springing from his character and his experience of life contributed to the decision. The blind scholar and pensioner had little cause to love society⁷ and much time to meditate on its rottenness: long before visiting Baghdád he must have formed an opinion of his fellow-men which (we may presume) accorded pretty well with what he afterwards wrote. In the hour of disillusion this moral current was undammed and gave irresistible force to the feeling that he would now close accounts with them for good and all.

I was made an abstainer from mankind by my acquaintance with them and my knowledge that created beings are dust¹.

His asceticism, though leavened by a religious element, is really the negative and individualistic side of his ethics. By abandoning an evil world he sought virtue and inward peace—*solitudinem fecit, pacem appellavit*². That is the note struck in the opening verse of the Luzûm:

The virtuous are strangers in their native land, they are left alone and forsaken by their kin³.

Society demoralises. No one can live by the law of reason amongst those whom he loves or hates; no one can fear God while pursuing objects of earthly ambition⁴. So far as the poet's ideal of asceticism includes active virtue, it will be examined in the final section. We are here concerned with his world-flight, i.e., such topics as the vanity of pleasure, the need for seclusion and the happiness procured by it, the excellence of poverty, contentment, humility, and patience. Some peculiar theories and practices are inculcated. Of these the most remarkable is his belief—a thoroughly rational one from the standpoint of pessimism—that procreation is a sin against the child.

Certain precepts in the following poem—e.g. the injunction against holding office under the Government—are characteristic of the strict pietism which developed in the Umayyad epoch and prevailed amongst the early Šúfís. It will be observed, however, that while the reader is exhorted to worship God and seek refuge with Him, nothing is said to indicate that what he has sown here he may hope to reap hereafter. The translation retains the monorhyme, but not the metre, of the original.

More important, as throwing light on the character of his asceticism, is a poem that has been partially translated by Von Kremer² and published by I. Krachkovsky with two Russian translations, one in prose and the other in verse, from the hand of Baron V. Rosen³. The challenge conveyed in the opening verse was taken up by Hibatu'llah Ibn Abí 'Imrán, the chief missionary (dā'i 'l-du'āt) of the Ismā'īlīs in Cairo, who begged for information as to the grounds on which the poet adopted vegetarianism. The letters that passed between them have been published and translated by Professor Margoliouth in the *Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society*⁴.

Here, as in many passages of the Luzúm, Ma'arrí preaches abstinence from meat, fish, milk, eggs, and honey on the plain ground that to partake of such food is an act of injustice to the animals concerned, since it inflicts unnecessary pain upon them³. In his reply to Ibn Abí 'Imrán he adds that on reaching the age of thirty⁴ he restricted himself to a vegetarian diet for the benefit of his health; besides, he could not afford to buy meat. The latter motives are clearly subordinate to the first, and are not inconsistent with it. Professor Margoliouth thinks that Ma'arrí cuts a poor figure in this correspondence. No doubt Ibn Abí 'Imrán found his letters unsatisfying. Whether he was deceived by what I have called the poet's oracular style or whether, being an Ismá'ílí, he supposed that every religious precept must have an esoteric doctrine behind it, he had hoped that "the tidings of sound truth" would yield something piquant: in fact, he wished to draw from Ma'arrí a confession as to the nature of his theological beliefs. "Why," he asks, "should you abstain from animal food? If God empowers one animal to eat another, though He knows best what is wise and is most merciful to His creatures, you need not be more just and merciful to them than their Lord and Creator." This line of argument was hardly one that a reputed heretic would care to pursue, while an earnest moralist might be excused for ignoring it. Must we solve the problem of evil before we can justify abstention from what reason and conscience forbid? Ma'arrí thought not. Having no solution, or none that he was willing to communicate, he took his stand with the Buddhists and Jainas on a principle which inspires all his ethics and constitutes his practical religion—the principle of non-injury. That was the "truth" which he promised to his readers, and they could not fairly reproach him if he declined to state how it was to be reconciled with divine providence, whatever his views on that subject may have been.

On the same ground he prohibits the use of animal skins for clothing, recommends wooden shoes¹, and blames fine ladies who wear furs². Probably he derived these doctrines from Indian asceticism, which he had opportunities of studying in Baghdád. Von Kremer identified them with Jainism, remarking that the prohibition of honey is peculiar to the Jainas³; which proves nothing, since any one who desired to live in accordance with the above-mentioned principle might naturally make this rule for himself. The Jainas, again, are forbidden to dye their clothes⁴, and Ma'arrí tells us that his dress was "of cotton, neither green nor yellow nor dark-grey⁵." When we come to his ethical discipline, we shall find that in the main it tallies with the ethics of Jainism as described in the following sentences:

The first stage of a Jaina layman's life is that of intelligent and well-reasoned faith in Jainism; and the second is when he takes a vow not to destroy any kind of life, not to lie, not to use another's property without his consent, to be chaste, to limit his necessities, to worship daily, and to give charity in the way of knowledge, medicine, comfort, and food. And these virtues are summed up in one word: ahimsā (not-hurting). "Hurt no one" is not merely a negative precept. It embraces active service also; for, if you can help another and do not—your neighbour and brother—surely you hurt him¹.

Little is said in the Luzúm about Indian ascetics. Ma'arrí refers to their habit of letting their nails grow long, and observes that he, like Moslems in general, considers it a mark of asceticism to pare the nails². He speaks with admiration of their religious suicide³. The Indian practice of cremation meets with his approval: fire saves the corpse from disinterment (and hyenas) and is a more effective deodoriser than camphor⁴. In another poem he says ironically that the cremated Indian is happy in being exempt from the torture which buried Mohammedans undergo.

He praises cremation without urging his readers to practise it. Let the dead be laid in mother earth, uncoffined: coffins are second graves⁷. How foreign to the spirit of Islam his asceticism is, and how fully it harmonises with Indian and Manichæan ideas, I can best show by quoting some passages of a different kind.

of mankind. If Ma'arri believed in a future existence, it would seem that he held the same opinion as Hafiz of its value in relation to the present:

A Paradise of pleasure
Bought with a world of pain—
Fie on the luckless treasure
That I must bleed to gain!

Recognising that his panacea is too heroic to be popular, he sometimes offers it in a diluted form. "If you must wed," says he, "take care to have no children¹"; and he censures the foolish Jew who divorced his wife because she was barren². He is more humane than logical in counselling men to seek husbands for their daughters but deter their sons from matrimony³.

IV.

PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION.

Ma'arri stands for the largest humanistic culture of his time. While he may properly be called a philosopher in so far as he sought after a reasoned view of life and the world, he was only an amateur of scientific philosophy. He reflects on its problems, takes up this or that theory in turns, and concludes that nothing is certain except death. His speculations are capricious and incoherent. "He is almost entirely wanting in the gift of combination. He can analyse, but he does not hit upon any synthesis, and his learning bears no fruit⁴." There is, however, something to be said on the other side. Philosophy is defined by Jāhiz as "Knowledge of the essences of things and the doing of that which is best⁵." Ma'arri is not primarily concerned with abstract truth. He seeks the True for the sake of the Good, and seldom loses sight of the practical end. We should also recollect that neither the form of his verse nor the circumstances in which it was composed allow us to see his philosophical and theological ideas in orderly relation to each other. He presents them as jumbled fragments of truth—and to this fact he may have partly owed his immunity from persecution—but it is at least arguable that for him they were a more or less consistent whole. Recently an attempt has been made by a Mohammedan savant to harmonise them¹, and we may assume that Ma'arri himself endeavoured to do the same. If so, the reticence which he practised in his correspondence with Ibn Abi 'Imrān and extols in many of his poems² is all the more tantalising; but while he disbelieved or doubted what is accepted as a matter of course by Moslems, his own beliefs seem to be deeply involved in contradiction and cannot, I think, have given him any firm ground for a solution of the problems with which he wrestled.

Upon those who pretend that his learning is barren one might retort that if he achieved no system of ethics, his moral creed was in some respects worthy of Socrates or Kant. But the result, let us admit, counts for little in comparison with the method. What gives Ma'arri importance in the history of Moslem thought is his critical attitude, his assertion of the rights of reason against the claims of custom, tradition and authority, and his appeal from the code of religion to the unwritten law of justice and conscience: in a word, his rationalism. He is a free-thinker at heart. Without openly denying Revelation or defying the authority of the Koran, he uses his own judgment in matters which Mohammedan orthodoxy regards as indisputable. For him, reason is "the most precious of gifts³"; it is the source of right knowledge and right action. Infallible it is not—many questions it must leave in suspense; yet wise men trust and obey it, convinced that nowhere will they meet with a surer guide “to point the morning and the evening ways¹.” In the moral domain he reaches a positive goal: virtue is not in doubt, whatever else may be².

When he applies this principle to metaphysical investigation, it does not take him very far, though his thoughts are sometimes suggestive. He appears to have had but a slight acquaintance with Greek and Moslem philosophy, but he could boast of an acute mind well stored with “curious information about every age³.” I may notice here a coincidence which illustrates his erudition. Mr Baerlein happens to remark that “he (Ma'arri) would have been as much bewildered as Herodotus if he had known that Lycians took their mother's, not their father's, name⁴.” Now, the poet knew the fact of which Mr Baerlein imagines him to have been ignorant, and these verses prove that he was not at all bewildered by it:

Euripides, and such was Ma'arrí¹. In the works of both we find three elements:

- (a) orthodox religious beliefs;
- (b) rational doubts as to the truth of these beliefs;
- (c) philosophical views inconsistent with these beliefs.

In Ma'arrí's case the contrast is sharper, because he does not write as a dramatist but as a moralist directly exhibiting or disguising his own character throughout. Like Euripides, he wrote for the minority who saw at once that if the pious asseverations were sincere, the parallel questionings were absurd, and who judged that the poet was more likely to want faith than wit. He, on his side, expected them to take hints in lieu of plain speech²; and no one can study the Luzúm without recognising that it is a masterpiece of innuendo. Apart from subtle ironies—of which the words italicised in the following passage may serve as a specimen:

(217)

Men race along the beaten track to reach
What inexperience imagines new.

These maiden thoughts are wed to minds that come
In every age to cull them and deflower³—

¹ The words used by Dr Farnell in characterising Euripides (Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics, vol. vi. p. 414 fol.) fit Ma'arrí exactly: "Being by nature a great poet, he had also something of the weakness of the 'polymath' or the 'intellectual'; he had not the steadiness of brain or strong conviction enough to evolve a systematic philosophy or clear religious faith; his was, in fact, the stimulating, eager, critical spirit, not the constructive. His mental sympathies and interests shift and range from pole to pole."

² See No. 234.

³ II. 79. 9.

the whole spirit of the book is anti-clerical and anti-orthodox, pleading for inquiry, suggesting incredulity, and shaking the foundations of revealed religious truth. Of course, Ma'arrí knew perfectly well what he was about. He must have known what inference as to moral responsibility and the reality of a future state would be drawn by some persons from these lines, for instance:

(218)

As regards the essential articles of Islam, his position is easily determined. When a dogma which it would have been suicidal to reject outright is professed on one page and doubted on the next, his credo is a refusal of martyrdom, and we take it for what it is worth. "Be veracious," he says, "until thou deemest veracity a danger to thy life; then lie through thick and thin⁴"; and again, "Do not acquaint rascals with the essence of thy religion, else thou wilt expose thyself to ruin⁵." Similarly, where the question is not one of faith or infidelity, but of orthodoxy or heterodoxy, and we find him wavering between two doctrines, it will appear probable that in his heart he agrees with the heretics. The positive beliefs or opinions to which he unconditionally commits himself are few. He loves interrogations and hypotheses. It is characteristic of him to turn a problem over in his mind, look at it from different aspects, and incline now to one solution, now to another. His curiosity exhausts itself in climbing hills of thought¹, only to discover that their summits are capped with mist.

Before examining his treatment of religion, including Islam, let us see the principles from which he starts.

He favours the Aristotelian doctrine of the eternity of matter. Against one verse in which it is expressly denied,

I do not believe in the everlastingness of the stars or hold the eternity of the world², there are many suggesting belief in it. That he should use guarded language will not surprise any one who knows what horror this theory inspires in Moslems of every sect.

 (Bodies are) substances put together and disjoined by a marvellous Power, so that they became like accidents⁸.

That is to say, bodies consist of eternal and indestructible substances (elements) which, in so far as they are subject to combination and decomposition, thereby assume the form of accidents. According to the orthodox (Ash'arite) view, both substance and accident are created by the will of God and have only a momentary duration⁹.

How many a pearl Time strings and strews at last!
 His Pleiad necklace holds for ever fast,
 But dark he leaves the fame and splendour of the Past¹.

It appears to me difficult to explain these and similar contradictions, which occur regularly when his orthodoxy is at stake, except by supposing that he means to contradict himself, and that his real or predominant view is the one which a writer accused of infidelity would be anxious to disown. He makes a practice of affirming or denying more or less explicitly what in other passages he affirms or denies with precaution in the contrary sense: the former class of statements is to be suspected².

I lift my voice whene'er I talk in vain,
 But do I speak the truth, hushed are my lips again³.

Religious dissimulation (taqiyyat) is well understood by Moslems; almost every zindiq (freethinker) employed it in self-defence, and it was cultivated as a fine art. Appreciation of our poet's skill in taking cover beneath this species of irony is the key to much that has puzzled European readers of the Luzûm. As to the influence of the stars, he shares the belief which prevailed amongst his contemporaries; but here too we find him vacillating. Have the planets a soul and intelligence, in virtue of which they operate on matter, or are they celestial bodies deriving their power from the motions of the spheres? Apparently Ma'arri embraced the second opinion, though he rather suggests than expresses it.

"A body of four (elements) overseen by seven (planets) which abide in twelve (zodiacal signs)⁴."

"Did those (Moslems) who wrought good works win Paradise, while Nawbakht was lodged in Hell-fire?"

² He declares frankly that the Luzûm is a mixture of truth and falsehood:

وليس على الحقائق كلّ قولى * ولكن فيه اصناف المجاز

(I. 435, 14; cf. 437, 8.)

This is not inconsistent with his assertion that the book contains nothing but moral truth (p. 51 above).

"Men will never be without evil in their time whilst Mars or Saturn continues over them³."

Mars and Saturn, however, are "two slaves forced to serve (God)⁴: I care not though they overtop me⁵."

In some of his poems he plays fancifully with the theory that the planets and constellations belong to an upper world of intelligences and souls, which is the archetype of the terrestrial world.

"Dead are the stars of Night, or sentient beings?

Irrational, or does reason dwell in them?⁶"

"If it be true that the luminaries of heaven are percipient, why do ye deny their loving one another and their relationship by marriage?

Maybe Canopus, the stallion of the stars, wedded a daughter of Arcturus on payment of a dowry⁷."

Then are the stars about religion too
 At odds like us—this Moslem and that Jew?
 Perchance in Heaven a Mecca may be found
 Like Mecca here, with Mecca's hills around.
 We needs must think that Light was made: the prime Eternal origin is darkful Time;
 Virtue a track untrodden, deep in sand,
 But Vice a highway through our human land¹.

 This life is but a ladder unto death⁴.

Ma'arri might have said with Kant, "Two things there are which the oftener and the more steadfastly we consider them, fill the mind with an ever new and an ever increasing admiration and reverence—the starry heaven above and the moral law within." It is not unlikely that in his blindness he retained, as Milton seems to have done, a peculiarly vivid recollection of "all luminous effects, all contrasts of light and darkness." Be this as it may, some of his finest poems are those in which his imagination contemplates

the great dome of Heaven, whose poles

His view of the nature of Time differs from that commonly accepted by Moslem philosophers. In the Risálatu 'l-Ghufrán he writes as follows: "Abuse of Time increased to such an extent that it was prohibited in the Apostolic Tradition, 'Do not abuse Time, for God is Time.' What this means is well-known⁴, and also that its inner sense is not that which appears on the surface, since none of the prophets ever held that Time is the Creator or the Object of worship; and we read in the Koran (45, 23), 'Nothing but Time destroys us⁵.' The statement of certain people, that Time is the motion of the heavenly sphere, is a phrase devoid of reality....I have given a definition that well deserves to have been anticipated, though I never heard it before, namely, that Time is a thing whereof the least part is capable of enclosing all objects of perception. In this respect it is the contrary of Space, because the least part of the latter cannot enclose a thing in the same way as a vessel encloses its contents¹."

¹ Cf. Nos. 1 and 229.² Luzúm, II. 368, 4.³ I. 169, 9.

⁴ According to the explanation offered by most theologians, abuse of Time is forbidden on the ground that, inasmuch as God is really the author of all the evil for which Time is blamed, to abuse Time is, in effect, to abuse God (cf. Lisán, v. 378 fol.). Some mystics say that al-Dahr (Time without beginning or end) is a name of God (Fuṣūṣu 'l-Hikam, Cairo, A.H. 1321, p. 257, 14 foll.).

⁵ These words are attributed to the Meccan idolaters who disbelieved in a future life.

We have already seen how he turns these ideas to account in the Luzúm, and I will now select a few passages where he develops them more clearly.

First, as to the eternity and infinity of Time:

"I see that Time is eternal and everlasting—glory to (God) the Preserver, the Perfect!²"

"Time is old, and beside his life, if thou wouldst measure it, the lives of the Eagles are brief³."

"If Gabriel were to fly away from Time for the remainder of his life, he would not be able to go outside of Time⁴."

Time, being independent of the revolutions of the celestial spheres, does not affect the course of events, which (indirectly, at any rate) is determined by the ever-changing position of the planets relatively to one another. Time brings nothing to pass; it is, so to speak, the neutral, unconscious atmosphere of all action and suffering. Man sins, by freewill or by fate: Time cannot sin and therefore ought not to be reviled⁵.

not make us laugh or weep.
We complain of Time, though he never sinned; and could he —and the most innocent of us is nigh unto the most wicked¹.

The following poem has a harmony of rhythm and power of expression equal to the high thoughts which inspired it.

(230)

"the Lord of Time," for Time is but a servant.
Thou canst not set a bound to the birth-time of this Sun, and reason declares that it is without beginning.

existing objects are not perceived by the short-haired hard-hoofed mares (the Hours).
When they go by, they return not, and others like them succeed: Time is past and future.
None of them that vanished came back after vanishing, yet nothing exists without Time, which is renewed continuously.
'Tis as though Thou (God) hadst placed souls in the images

² Cf. II. 326, 17:

Men are diverse in their aims: forgetful and mindful, careless and anxious, building and ruining¹.

The conclusion stated in the penultimate verse rests on the premiss that the world is eternal; whence it follows that the number of human souls is infinite.

In all this we can trace many resemblances to the Pythagorean natural philosophy, of which the physician Abú Bakr al-Rází (Rhazes) is the most illustrious exponent. Al-Rází died forty or fifty years before Ma'arrí was born. His metaphysic "starts from old doctrines, which his contemporaries ascribed to Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Mani and others. At the apex of his system stand five co-eternal principles—the Creator, the Universal Soul, the First or Primeval Matter, Absolute Space, and Absolute Time or Eternal Duration. In these the necessary conditions of the actually existing world are given. The individual sense-perceptions, generally, presuppose an existing Matter, just as the grouping of different perceived objects postulates Space. Perceptions of change further constrain us to assume the condition of Time. The existence of living beings leads us to recognise a Soul; and the fact that some of these living beings are endowed with Reason, i.e. have the faculty of bringing the Arts to the highest perfection, necessitates our belief in a wise Creator, whose Reason has ordered everything for the best²."

Ma'arrí, too, believes in a Creator³, whom he identifies with Allah. He emphatically repudiates atheism. God is a reality (ḥaqq)⁴, One, eternal, omnipotent, and wise (ḥakím): His wisdom is demonstrated by His works. While it is neces-

"An eternal Creator, as to whom there is no doubt, and Time eternal in relation to mankind.

It is possible that anterior to this Adam there should be one Adam after another" (i.e. an infinite series of human beings).

The words "in relation to mankind" serve to guard the poet from the imputation that he makes Time co-eternal with God. Elsewhere (II. 43, 12-14) he refers to the ancient tradition that Adam is the son of Time.

sary to have an intelligent belief in the Supreme Being¹, speculation concerning His essence and attributes is futile, since the mind cannot comprehend them².

In the verse (II. 219, 14):

Dost not thou see that the planets move in their spheres by the power of a Lord who moveth not?

Ma'arrí probably means that God transcends all change, that He is eternal and infinite in His nature—not "motionless" (ghayr muntaqil) in the sense that, being actus purus, He never passes from potentiality to actuality³.

And the astronomer has been taught what affirms the truth of Religion—
Stars of fire and stars akin to earth and water and wind¹.
The sagacious man of the company is he that understands a hint, so that he deems it a plain statement².

It appears, then, that Ma'arrí was a monotheist. But was he a monotheist in the same sense as Mohammed was, or as the Moslem scholastic theologians were? For him, Time and Space are infinite: therefore the Creator cannot be outside of them.

The problem of reconciling the Greek idea of "a Divinity which invests the whole of Nature⁴" with the Semitic "conception of God as will, as the sovereign over all⁵," is not touched by Ma'arrí. If reason convinced him that the world is eternal and has a Creator, a divine intelligence which eternally moves and maintains it⁶, the facts of life as he saw them stood hopelessly against this theory¹ and threw him back upon the notion of an all-powerful and inscrutable will working throughout the universe of evil which it created for some mysterious end. Beyond this he seems to have been unable to go, and here his rationalism breaks down. He finds the world so radically unreasonable that in order to account for it he must call in a deus ex machinâ—the Allah of the Koran. The decree of Allah, i.e. Fate, makes things what they are.

While Ma'arrí acknowledges that Fate, like Time, is subject to Allah², his language occasionally suggests that he felt the pressure of an impersonal necessity emanating from the planets and controlling all human action; but since he writes with the freedom of a poet, we cannot safely give his words an interpretation which they do not demand. He holds God, or Fate, responsible for the evil nature implanted in mankind and for its consequences, and declares that God is just, without attempting to prove it.

"Our natures did not become evil by our choice, but in consequence of a (divine) command which the fates made a means (to its fulfilment)³."

"I see evidences of a compulsion (jabr) which I do not assert to be a fact: 'tis as though every one were dragged to (commit) evil⁴."

While in these passages he approaches an absolute determinism, in others (which are exceptional, however) he keeps clear of it, and his moral rationalism assures him that God, who creates injustice, is Himself just.

I perceived that men are naturally unjust to one another, but there is no doubt of the justice of Him who created injustice².

Here reason triumphs over experience, but for the most part it struggles in vain against the fatalistic pessimism which has been amply illustrated in these pages³. Ma'arri cannot "justify the ways of God to man." Only once, I think, does he make the least advance in that direction:

(Metre: Tawil.)

By sin's ladder it may be that men to religion climb,

As digging makes fire spark up ere gushes the water⁴.

He concludes by dismissing the whole question of predestination as a sterile theological controversy which interferes with the practice of virtue, and by telling his readers that the truth lies somewhere between the rival schools.

The former might assert divine justice and interpret the Koran by the light of reason, but they were theologians, they did not make reason independent of Revelation or authorise it to decide all things, beginning with the credibility of Revelation itself. Therefore he says, thrusting both parties aside,

Ask pardon of God and never mind what Abu 'l-Hudhayl and Ibn Kalláb told their followers¹.

Partly on rational grounds and partly, perhaps, by instinct Ma'arri believed in the existence of a divine Creator. But, according to the second article of the Mohammedan creed, that Creator is revealed through prophecy: belief in Allah involves belief in the Koran, Mohammed, and Islam.

I have already remarked on the poet's ambiguous attitude towards the religion which he professed. In the Luzúm he speaks with two voices, one pious and conventional in tone, ¹ I. 131, 5. Cf. II. 172, 2 foll. Abu 'l-Hudhayl Muḥammad ibn 'Alláf (ob. circa A.D. 840) was a celebrated Mu'tazilite doctor: see D. B. Macdonald, Muslim Theology, p. 136 foll. Ibn Kalláb, whom Shahrastání (pp. 20 and 65 in Cureton's edition) mentions by the name of 'Abdullah ibn Sa'id al-Kallábí, was an orthodox scholastic theologian of the same period.

² Theological and other learned books entitled Mughni or 'Umda are numerous. According to the commentator on the Luzúm (I. 249), al-'Umda is the title of a work by 'Abdu 'l-Jabbár (see Brockelmann, Gesch. der Arab. Litteratur, I. 411), the Mu'tazilite cadi of Rayy, who was contemporary with Ma'arri and is referred to in terms of reprobation (Luzúm, II. 172, 4).

the other critical, ironic, irritating to men of firm faith, and anything but reassuring to the weaker brethren. His doubts are not concerned with minor points of doctrine; they are fundamental. We cannot dispose of them by setting his affirmations against them, as though it were simply a question of striking a balance. The anti-Islamic tendency is too deep and deliberate to be explained away. If the author was a Moslem, why should he have written so equivocally and yet significantly? If he was not a Moslem but wished to pass for one, it is easy to understand both the orthodox expressions and his peculiar method of insinuating disbelief. This hypothesis does not oblige us to maintain that during his forty years' seclusion he consistently held the same views and never doubted his own doubts. In some moods he may have reverted to the more positive state of mind which he finally abandoned for a bare deism¹. "I confess," he says, "belief in One God and the avoidance of evil actions. For a long time I deceived myself and judged that one who is a liar spoke the truth about certain things²." Such fluctuations are, in any case, unimportant. On the whole, his Mohammedan sentiments (where they are not mere forms of speech) must be regarded as fictitious and insincere. Nevertheless, he could not do without them—in his books: their omission would have condemned him. While he used them to mystify and baffle the enemies of free-thought, he also knew how to make them serve the cause of its friends.

the Koran—an act of irreverence in which he followed the example set by several Moslem free-thinkers¹; yet he violently censures one of these, Ibnu 'l-Ráwandí, who had been guilty of the same impiety, and pays an eloquent tribute to the Koran, describing it as a book that “overcame and disabled and caused the Prophet’s foes to shiver when confronted with it².” The Risálatu 'l-Ghufrán, an epistle which Ma'arrí addressed to the scholar and poet Ibnu 'l-Qáriḥ ('Alí ibn Maṣṣúr al-Ḥalabí), contains, in addition to many anecdotes of the zindíqs and blasphemous quotations from their poetry, a burlesque description of Paradise, where in the manner of Lucian he depicts the pre-Islamic heathen bards revelling and quarrelling and taking part in a literary causerie. Although some persons upheld his orthodoxy, the mask was thin and might not have availed him, if the state of Syria during his lifetime had left the authorities at leisure to deal with offences of this kind. As it was, he ran no great risk. The Fátimids were indulgent, and the Mirdásids indifferent, to religious scepticism, which indeed found plenty of support both amongst the learned classes and men of the world.

Ma'arrí nowhere asserts that the dogma of Revelation is false. His way of handling this question has not hitherto been studied with sufficient care. If we wish to understand the Luzúmiyyát, we must realise that the author intended not only to disguise his opinions but also to make the disguise a means of indicating them. Dissimulation was, in all the circumstances, inevitable: under its safeguard might not the truth venture out—duly chaperoned and veiled? Such a delicate experiment in the art of “implying things” called for correspondingly fine apprehension on the part of the reader, and Ma'arrí knew his contemporaries well enough to feel sure that not many of them would master his secret. He gave them a chance of convincing themselves, none of convicting him. At the worst, his faith would be impeached on the ground of inferences which are apparently disproved by orthodox confessions.

To begin with, he divides men into two classes, according as they are religious or intelligent: they cannot be both.

(239)

Although your mouths hymn Allah One and Peerless,
Your hearts and souls from that ye owe Him shrink.
I swear your Torah gives no light to lead us,
If there 'tis found that wine is lawful drink.

* * * * *

They all err—Moslems, Christians, Jews, and Magians;
Two make Humanity's universal sect:
One man intelligent without religion,
And one religious without intellect¹.

These verses are addressed or refer to the followers of Mohammed, Jesus, Moses, and Zoroaster, i.e. to all whose religion is derived from a scripture brought by a prophet².

The second couplet is highly characteristic. Taken out of the context, it might be read as a good Moslem's appeal to the authority of the Koran, which forbids wine-drinking, against the corrupt doctrine of the Pentateuch. That interpretation, however, pays no regard to logic. Ma'arrí's objection to wine-drinking, as we learn from many poems in the Luzúm, is non-religious.

Say to wine, which is contrary to Reason and ever causes the warrior's sword to be unsheathed,
"If thou wert interdicted by nothing but pain (after pleasure),
thou wouldst have been allowable to the drinker;

¹ II. 201, 2. Elsewhere (Luzúm, II. 329, 4) he says that two things make men religious: either feebleness of mind or lofty aspiration.

² Moslems, of course, reckon Jesus amongst the prophets, though a semi-spiritual origin and nature distinguish him from the rest of the line. The Koran makes no mention of Zoroaster; but in one passage (22, 17) the Magians are ranked with the Jews and Christians, whom, because they possess inspired scriptures, Mohammed calls "the people of the Book."

But thou art banned by sovereign Reason, so get thee gone into the dusty soil!"¹

Men say wine destroys old griefs that bide in the breast;
And were it not destructive to the intellect, I should have been a friend of wine and jollity².

Manifestly, therefore, his meaning is: "If the Torah sanctions wine-drinking, the Torah misguides us: we must obey Reason, not Revelation." The fact that in this instance he happens to agree with Mohammed leaves the general principle untouched. All religions are mixed with falsehood and, so far, stand on the same level. When he says

(242)

Follow Reason and do what it deems good, for it gathers the honey of counsel,
And accept not a commandment from the Torah, for verily the truth is hidden from it³—

his readers must be dull if they fail to see why in preaching rationalism to Moslems he attacks the supernaturalism of Jews. One guesses, too, that the following lines have a wider application than appears on the surface:

(243)

The Jews went astray: their Torah is an invention of the doctors and rabbis,
Who pretended to have derived it from one (a prophet) like themselves; then traced it further back to the Almighty.
Whenever you discomfit a man who argues for his religion, he hands over its keys (the task of defending it) to the traditions (by which it is attested)⁴.

² II. 312, 14. Cf. II. 361, 12: "If wine were lawful, I would not drink it, forasmuch as it makes my reasonableness (hilm) weigh light in the scale."

³ I. 394, 8.

⁴ I. 411, 10. Cf. I. 289, 1; II. 12, 12. "The Ṣaḥiḥ (a book purporting to contain those Traditions of the Prophet which can be regarded as authentic) is false beyond doubt" (I. 209, 1).

Another of his devices consists in putting forward an orthodox statement which is immediately discredited by the sequel.

(244)

The Christians built for their Messiah churches
Which almost rail at what the churchfolk do;
And if Mohammed and his Book I mention,
Then out with his Book comes the scoffing Jew.

Can any one deny Islam's religion,
Fashioned and brought to us by Fate divine?
Oh, where is Truth, that we may toil to seek it
With cruel pain o'er sands without a sign?¹

Since good and evil alike are "fashioned and brought to us by Fate divine," the compliment to Islam seems a little unhappy; but letting that pass, we discover in the next verse that the religion "which nobody can deny" is not identical with Truth². Some Mohammedan critics have attributed the poet's eccentric opinions to the necessities of the difficult rhyme³. To speak plainly, this is nonsense. Ma'arri does not write at random: within a certain orbit his eccentricities are calculated and logical. His doubts, perplexities, and real inconsistencies only begin, as I have said, when his rationalism breaks down. Reason led him to conclusions which were not the less firm because they were chiefly of a negative kind; it showed him, for example, that Revelation is a false earthly light kindled and spread by men who had their own interests in view. Reason showed him

² Cf. a similar reductio ad absurdum of the dogma of Resurrection (II. 195, 2-3):

"It is said that there is no hope of a resurrection for the recompense of good works, but what thou hast heard concerning that matter is the pretence of a vain jester.

And how should the body be called to bliss after it has become rotten or been confined in the earth?"

Here the words "concerning that matter" are ambiguous, so that it is possible to regard the whole passage as a statement made by infidels and related by the poet.

³ Letters of Abu 'l-'Alâ, Introd., p. 38.

this—and left him, believing in God, to wrap himself in his virtue as best he could.

(245)

I shall pass away, not misdoubting the Creator, so weep not for me nor let others weep.

Follow my ways, since they are good for you, and pray and give alms as long as ye live.

Do not listen to tellers of lying stories which the feeble mind deems true.

I see action as (vain as) inaction, and a world dragged to ruin by a violent Fate,

And lines copied on a palimpsest and afterwards obliterated or rubbed out¹.

We have examined a few specimens of the irony which Ma'arri cultivated in order to publish his opinions with impunity, and which has been ignored by most students of the Luzûmiyyât, if it has not eluded them entirely. He had no need to employ it in his criticism of the Jewish and Christian sacred books; for, according to Mohammed, the Pentateuch and Gospel are corrupt in their present form, though originally they contained the same Word which Allah revealed in the Koran. The poet, therefore, attacks Judaism and Christianity without any disguise. I will only cite two passages concerning the Crucifixion.

(246)

The Christians have testified that the Jews sought Jesus in order to crucify him;

And (in admitting this) they took no heed, though they had made him a god for the sake of preserving him from disparagement and reproach².

² Mohammed rejects the Crucifixion (Koran, 4, 156): to him it was incredible that a prophet should suffer such an indignity. Ma'arri, accepting neither the Christian nor the Mohammedan view of Jesus, regards the Crucifixion as an historical fact which proves the Christian doctrine to be absurd.

³ Luzûm, II. 406, 1.

Marvellous! The Messiah amongst mankind, he who was said to be unbegotten!

The Christians delivered him to the Jews and confessed that they crucified him.

When a child is beaten by lads of the same age, the judicious and reasonable man takes pity on him;

And if what they say about Jesus is true, where was his father?

How did He abandon His son to the enemy? Or do they suppose that they (the Jews) overcame Him?¹

It was as easy for Ma'arrí to deny the divinity of Christ as it was difficult to express any doubts about the prophetic inspiration which, according to the Koran, he shared with Moses and Mohammed. The prophets stood or fell together. Frank scepticism being thus excluded, the poet resorts to his favourite weapon, but does not forget that the words "Mohammed is the Apostle of God" form half of the Moslem profession of faith.

Some parties declared that your God did not send Jesus and Moses (as prophets) to mankind,

But they only provided a means of livelihood for their followers and made a net to catch all men.

Had I been able, I would have punished those who were unconscionably impious, until (all) the miscreants were entombed².

At first sight these lines arouse no suspicion: the author means that disbelievers in prophecy are blasphemous scoundrels and ought to be punished with death³. This, of course, is

³ Cf. II. 16, 9: "Men are such liars that an ignorant fellow asserts prophecy to be a fiction and a fraud"; and II. 416, 10: "Moses came forward with the Torah and devoted to perdition those who investigated (the authenticity of) it. His men said, 'Inspiration came to him,' while the wicked said, 'Nay, he forged it.'" In the language of orthodoxy rationalists are fools and knaves, and they sometimes borrow these names. Cf. Euripides, Iphigeneia in Tauris, 262 foll., cited by Verrall, Euripides the Rationalist, p. 174. Ma'arrí recommends that sects which deny the divine Unity should be confronted with the unitarianism of the sword the Moslem view. Ma'arrí durst not impugn it openly, and he may be professing it here, but readers familiar with his style will remark that the tag, "some people say," is often used by him to introduce rationalistic judgments for which he declines to be held accountable. Further, "they" in the second verse is equivocal: we can refer it, as we please, either to the disbelievers in prophecy or to the prophets themselves; and the latter reference is suggested by the rhyme-word námús, which in this context would naturally be taken as the Arabicised form of νόμος, so that the translation would run:

"And they (the prophets) only provided a means of livelihood for their followers and made a religious law for all men."

The verse has not passed unscathed through the hands of Mohammedan scribes. We find the oldest and probably genuine tradition in the Oxford Codex, where it stands thus:

وَأَمَّا جَعَلُوا الرَّحْمَانَ مَأْكَلَةً * وَصَيَّرُوا دِينَهُمُ لِلْمَلِكِ نَامُوسًا

"But they made the Merciful (God) a means of livelihood and turned their religion into a trick for gaining power."

Who, then, are the miscreants of the last verse? The heretics or the pseudo-prophets? If that question had been put to Ma'arrí, he might have answered by quoting his own advice:

"O credulous man, if thou art endowed with understanding, consult it; for every understanding is a prophet¹."

When the poet writes a brief eulogy of Mohammed², he restricts himself to terms which might be used of any religious and moral reformer³. Only with the final blessing—

(II. 111, last line), and doubts whether the sword is "a faithful monotheist," seeing that it has spared the heretics for so long (II. 374, 1-2). For him, however, ilhād (polytheism or atheism) is an offence against Reason (I. 423, 5).

أَيُّهَا الْغُرَّانُ خُصِّصْتَ بِعَقْلِ * فَاسْأَلْنَهُ فَكَلَّ عَقْلُ نَبِيٍّ

² II. 214, 4-12.

فصلّى عليه الله—comes a suggestion of the Moslem's attitude. "Do not begin a quarrel with me," he says, appealing to the Christians, "for in my opinion your Messiah is the peer of Mohammed," i.e. the prophets are just as much in the dark as all the rest of us¹.

Ma'arri, in fact, regards Islam, and positive religion generally, as a human institution. As such, it is false and rotten to the core. Its founders sought to procure wealth and power for themselves, its dignitaries pursue worldly ends, its defenders rely on spurious documents which they ascribe to divinely inspired apostles, and its adherents accept mechanically whatever they are told to believe.

The following passages illustrate his point of view.

If knowledge aids not me nor baulks my foe,
The losers in Life's game are those who know.
As Allah laid our fortune, so it lies
For ever—O vain wisdom of the wise!
Can this doomed caitiff man, tho' far he fly,
'Scape from his Lord's dominion, earth and sky?
Nay, soon shall we, the hindmost gang, tread o'er
The path our fellow-slaves have trod before.
Surveying humankind, I marvel still
How one thirsts while another drinks his fill.
I draw my bow and every shaft flies wide,
The arrow aimed at me ne'er turns aside.

² l. 260, 14. The last verse contrasts the vanity of Religion with the eternal and immutable process of Fate (cf. No. 263), and hints that what has been said of Christianity and Judaism applies equally to Islam. Cf. the poet's ironical tribute to the Law of Mohammed (l. 240, 15): "What a fine religion is this Law of ours! It stands firm, unabrogated, amidst that which has suffered abrogation."

³ Furqân, properly meaning "deliverance" or "redemption," was used by Mohammed in the sense of "Revelation." Here it signifies "Koran," which Ma'arri was too cautious to write, though it would have suited the metre just as well.

My body and my spirit are like a child and its mother: they are tied, that to this, by the hand of the Lord.
 They die simultaneously⁴, and neither is the body lost (to the ¹ The idea that the spirit corrupts and wears out the body is expressed in the following passages: "Does my spirit blame my body, which never ceased to serve it until it (the body) became too weak? And yet my spirit laid upon it amazing burdens, now one by one, now two at a time. The state of Man is contrary to that of trees, for they (being void of spirit) bear fruit, whilst he commits sin" (I. 78, 1). "The spirit's dwelling in the body makes it (the body) diseased, and its departure restores it (the body) to health. The body, when it returns to earth, does not feel the winds that sweep away its dust in the grave" (II. 421, 3). "If a spirit dwelt in the mountains of the earth, neither Naḍādi nor Irāb would be everlasting" (I. 91, 3; cf. 287, 5).

 How oft the soul, her hour of parting nigh,
 Will show contrition for the sins she wrought;
 And if our spirits now rust in us, anon
 Like brass re-burnished they may newly shine³.

Ma'arrí rejects the doctrine of metempsychosis and even derides it. In the Risálatu 'l-Ghufrán he quotes these verses

¹ I. 103, 9.² I. 81, 2.³ II. 171, 3.

by one of the Nuṣayrís, a sect which had many adherents in the districts lying south and west of the river Orontes:

Marvel, mother, at the accidents of Time, that made our sister dwell in a mouse.

Drive these cats away from her and let her have the straw in the sack¹.

So in the Luzúm:

(277)

O apple-eater, mayst thou not perish! and let none mourn thee as lost on the day of thy death!

The Nuṣayrî said—not I (hearken, therefore, and encourage thy recreants on the battle-field!):

“Thou hast been an apple in thy time, and the apple thou eatest was once thine eater.”²

(278)

’Tis said that spirits remove by transmigration
From body into body, till they are purged;
But disbelieve what error may have urged,
Unless thy mind confirm the information.

Tho’ high their heads they carry, like the palm,
Bodies are but as herbs that grow and fade.
Hard polishing wears out the Indian blade,
Allay thy soul’s desires and live calm³.

(Metre: Tawîl.)

(279)

Oh, long, very long, hath been the way to the night-rider
Who sees in the pitchy dark no flame stirred to leaping.
Obedience to Law we found a yoke on the minds of men,
Tho’ none that hath proved the Days denies abrogation.
If once on a time some Jews were changed into animals⁴,

³ II. 171, 9. With the last verse cf. I. 207, 7 foll.: “None knows Time but they that do not abase themselves in defeat or exult in success.... They are the clear-sighted: whether they know or conjecture, I deem that they are at rest in a plain certainty.”

⁴ This verse alludes to a legend (cf. Koran, 2, 61) that in David’s time certain Jews who went fishing on the sabbath were transformed by God into apes.

What aileth this age that no such miracle happens?
 And some transmigrationist fanatics have gone so far,
 They deem souls alive in plants or minerals and metals.
 How generous soe'er thou be and fain to forgive, yet more
 Forgiving our Maker is, and more open-handed¹.

The fact that the Koran reveals the existence of angels and other good and evil spirits (Jinn) does not hinder Ma'arri from using his long experience of life as an argument for incredulity². If there are no human beings in Heaven, then there are no angels on earth or below it³. God is omnipotent: therefore angels are possible; and at this point our knowledge ends.

I deny not the power of Allah to create forms of light, fleshless and bloodless—
 And the seer is blind like me: come on, then, let us knock against one another in the dark!⁴

(281)

Fear thou the Lord, unafraid, albeit in darkness
 With tales of Jinn they scare thee and make thee fearful.
 All that is a patched-up bogey for beguiling
 The thoughtless and stupid. Far from thee such stuff be!⁵

He also finds unconvincing the tradition that women who wear anklets are loved and followed by evil spirits⁶.

Resurrection and Retribution are the twin corner-stones of Islam. We have seen what Ma'arri thought of the authority on which these doctrines depend, and we know that he could not take them ready-made from that source. If he had any genuine belief in them, it was based on grounds which he considered reasonable. To judge from his writings, he neither believed nor wholly disbelieved in a conscious existence after death, but remained a sceptic because no empirical evidence was forthcoming. Besides, what proof would have satisfied a mind like his? Not, I think, our books of psychical research, much as they might have interested him. Clearly, if he was unable to affirm the immortality of the soul, he would be even less inclined to admit the resurrection of the body, a doctrine which he sometimes professes in agreement with the Koran, while in other poems his real attitude towards it is hardly disguised.

Most of the passages written from the orthodox stand-point are formal in tone¹. Here is one in a different vein, but we cannot suppose that it was meant to be taken seriously:

The astrologer and physician, both of them,
Deny the resurrection of the body.
"Oh, get ye gone!" said I; "if your belief
Be true, then I lose nothing; or if mine,
'Tis upon you perdition falls, not me."²

The possibility of such a resurrection is acknowledged:

By the wisdom of my Creator comes to pass my folding and unfolding,
And the Creator is not incapable of raising me from the dead³.

(283)

As for the Resurrection, the controversy about it is notorious, but the mystery thereof is not revealed.
Some have said that the pearl of the diver will never return to the darkness of the shell⁴;
But the wonders of Almighty God are many: our reason contemplating them becomes infirm and dumbfounded⁵.

This is designedly "economical" and its meaning could not be missed by any intelligent reader of the Luzüm. I will quote a few more examples.

Our bodies are raised by feet of travellers passing
 In gloom of the night across some crumbling sand-flat.
 A life and a death—'tis all that our fate shows clearly,
 Tho' pietists work in hope of a resurrection.
 No foot is imparadised by a dainty anklet,
 No ear is beatified by a pearly earring¹.

(285)

Death's debt is then and there
 Paid down by dying men;
 But 'tis a promise bare
 That they shall rise again².

(286)

With optic glass go question thou the stars that roll o'erhead,
 The stars that take away the taste of honey gathered³:
 They point to death, no doubt, but not to rising from the dead⁴.

(287)

O star, in heaven thou shinest from of old
 And point'st a flawless moral to the wise.
 Death's fixed and certain date thou hast foretold;
 Then why not tell us when the dead shall rise? ⁵

(288)

We laugh, but inept is our laughter,
 We should weep, and weep sore,
 Who are shattered like glass and thereafter
 Remoulded no more⁶.

Were thy body left after death in the state which it was in before, we might have hoped for its restoration (to life), Even as wine returned once again to the emptied jar that was not broken in pieces; But it became parts divided, and then atoms of dust ever being swept away in the wind-blasts¹.

In his references to the Mohammedan doctrine of future rewards and punishments the poet is similarly versatile. He often writes as one who believes in Paradise and Hell and even in the Koranic representation of them². He says more than once that he hopes, not to enter the Garden, but to be saved from the Fire³; and he accepts the dogma of everlasting damnation qualified sometimes by faith in the infinite mercy of God.

Dust of mine ancient mother I shake off,
And that is deemed a cutting of one's kin.
Oh, little I care what Allah threateneth
His creatures with, if once the Fire consume
And char my limbs to ashes. But—'tis life
Endless, an immortality of pain
Whilst ages pass, and mercy nevermore⁴.

God will not let the labours of the pious be lost: on that point Abú Nuwás, the libertine, concurs with Abu 'l-'Atáhiya, the ascetic⁵. Manifestly, virtue is not rewarded in this world⁶. Do good for its own sake: the Almighty can, if He please, bestow the thawáb upon us; otherwise, Death is our recompense⁷. The following passages are more or less tinged with scepticism.

They averred that I shall grow young again. How, oh, how may that come to me, although I desire it?
 And I shall visit Paradise, they say, and my face will be made Sabbath stayed.

 A tale that is told about the guarded preserve, 'twas that Aroused me, but no sure man is he who related it³.

(294)

If blest I shall be proven past denying,
 Oh, would in earth's lap I were lying!

The deep well of Death whose sides are lined with the hateful stones.

Does any one going hence expect robes of green beyond,
When these dusky shrouds within the earth have been torn to shreds?

To me thereanent came news, a medley of tangled tales,
By ways that perplex and foil men eager to know the truth.
Ay, short of it fell the Zoroastrian archimage,
The bishop of Christian folk, the rabbin and scribe of Jews,
And wrote legends of their own in volumes which long ago
Have surely been lost, their ink and paper consumed away.
The sects disagreed about the happenings after death,
And those are engulfing seas whereof none may reach the shore.
'Twas said, "Human souls have power and freedom in what they do,"

And some answered, "Nay, 'tis plain they act by necessity."
And oh, had our bodies been created of marble rock,
They scarce had endured the shocks of ever recurring change¹.

Although our deeds in this
Are not so fair that we should hope Heaven's balconies.

Folk carry not from here

But laden with their sins depart and disappear.

Reason was dumb. "Ask, then,"
Said I, "the reverend men";
But naught could they decide: this lay beyond their ken.

They talked and lied. When pressed
To put all to the test
Of logic, they broke down in impotence confessed².

As Ma'arrî appeals to Reason against Revelation, so does he contrast the observance of religion with the practice of morality. Not that pietism is inconsistent with virtue, but it is distinctly subordinate: prayers, fasts, and almsgivings are all very well; righteousness is essential. The emphasis placed upon the latter implies a certain indifference to the former and almost conveys the impression that le mieux est l'ennemi du bon.

Walk seventy times, not seven, the Temple round—
And impious remain!
Devoutness is to them unknown that may Enjoy, and are not found
With courage to abstain².

(299)

If thou wilt put into practice the plain texts which are the foundation of the Book (the Koran), thou wilt find them sufficient for the performance of thy obligations.
Neither a (book of) Revelation nor a sermon relieved thy mind (from doubt), but wert thou obedient to God, a single verse would relieve thee³.

When the poet says, "Fear and obey God," he means, of course, "shun evil and do good." This, in his eyes, is the kernel of the Koran.

I swear by Allah thou hast no religion.

Ma'arri's criticism of Islam goes to the root of the matter. If he is right, there is an end of the divine authority on which the whole system rests: its laws and institutions can be judged on their merits and approved or rejected as the principles of a rational ethic require. From this standpoint its ascetic features (including the prohibition of wine) commended themselves to him. Although, by his own confession, he was somewhat lax in regard to public worship¹, he assails only one—and that the most vulnerable—of the five "pillars" of Mohammedanism. The Ḥajj (pilgrimage to Mecca) was taken over by the Prophet from the pagan Arabs and incorporated in Islam as a concession to national sentiment: all Moslem men and women are bound, "if they can find a way," to perform it at least once in their lives. Ma'arri had a good excuse for neglecting this injunction, which in any case he would have disobeyed. Others might be impressed by the religious enthusiasm of the pilgrims; he saw in the Ḥajj a relic of heathendom², a carnival of superstition and immorality.

(301)

Fortune is (so strangely) allotted, that rocks are visited (by pilgrims) and touched with hands and lips,
Like the Holy Rock (at Jerusalem) or the two Angles of Quraysh³, howbeit all of them are stones that once were kicked⁴.

(302)

Methinks, the metropolis (Mecca) is deserted and her ants have departed from her villages⁵.
And how oft did the companies (of pilgrims) journey by night towards Ṣalāḥ⁶ and suffer great hardships in their journey!

² Cf. I. 391, 1: "May thy intelligence save thee from a heathen's journey to visit Ayla and the land of Nakhr!" Ayla is the name of a mountain between Mecca and Medina. I cannot find any mention of Nakhr; the name may perhaps refer to Muntakhar (Táju 'l-'Arús) or Muntakhir (Yáqút), a place in the same district.

We have noted how the poet censures whatever seems to him superstitious and irrational. Thus, to mention some slighter instances, he condemns augury² and belief in omens, e.g. the custom of exclaiming "God be praised!" (al-ḥamd) when any one sneezes³. He declares that the descendants of Ham owe their colour to nature, not to the sins of their progenitor⁴. Concerning the legends which attribute extraordinary length of life to certain patriarchs, heroes, and wizards⁵, he remarks that those who reckoned the age of such persons appear to have counted months as years⁶. his opinion, holy men never flew in air or walked on water¹. The words, "if thou wilt devote thy heart entirely to God, the beasts of prey will do thee no hurt²," immediately follow an exhortation to act according to reason and cannot be taken as evidence of his belief in miracles; the context rather suggests that "the beasts of prey" are women of bad character. He had nothing of the mystical spirit, and his allusions to Şúfism—a name which in his time covered much vagabondage and licence—are contemptuous. He gives the correct derivation from şúf (wool):

Şúfis—their name bore witness to Reason that they are woolly sheep with necks (hanging as though) broken³.

He doubts whether their rapture is so religious as they pretend⁴, calls them "one of Satan's armies⁵," and accuses them of travelling from land to land to fill their bellies and gratify their lusts⁶. This description, however, applies only to the evil-doers amongst them: "the God-fearing (Şúfi), when thou wouldst rival him, surpasses thee; he is like the sun, whose radiance no defilement comes near, and the full moon, which is too glorious to be affected by vituperation⁷." That a free-thinker should speak of mystics with admiration and respect will not surprise those who remember how often extremes meet. Free-thought and mysticism converge from opposite sides in order to strike at orthodoxy. Şúfis, who regard forms of creed and ritual as relatively true and therefore as obstacles to the attainment of essential truth, have something in common with zindíqs like Ma'arrí, who "acknowledge neither prophet nor sacred book⁸" nor any law that is not sanctioned by the inner light of reason. Both these ways of thought are hostile to sectarianism and lead in practice to a large toleration which places Jews and Christians on the same level with Moslems. Many poems in the Luzúm express the view that "man's inhumanity to man" is fostered and made fiercer by religion, while in others the poet protests against bigotry¹, pleads for religious equality, and declares that if men act rightly it does not matter what they believe.

² II. 82, 4.

³ II. 53, last line. Quss and Manash (Manasseh) seem to be used here as typical Christian and Jewish names, without reference to persons. Moslems would associate the former with Quss ibn Sá'ida, the celebrated bishop of Najrán, by whose eloquence Mohammed is said to have been stirred. As regards Manasseh, Professor Bevan has pointed out that a Jew of this name was chosen to be viceroy of Syria by the Fátimid Caliph, al-'Aziz (ob. A.D. 996). His nomination gave deep offence to the Moslems of Egypt and on their petition he was arrested and heavily fined (Ibnu 'l-Athír, ed. Tornberg, vol. IX. p. 81). The duties of the nāẓir are explained by Lane in his Modern Egyptians (London, 1871), vol. I. p. 102.

In my opinion, the (Christian) priest is better for thee than a Moslem who preaches in the congregational mosque¹.

Ye wronged others, and they in turn were made to prevail against you: the best of men pronounce mankind to be wrong-doers. Ye treated the metropolitan of the Christians with indignity, though he was revered by the followers of Mary's son; And yet your own Prophet said to you, "When he that is honoured by his people comes (amongst you), show him honour!"

Therefore, let not your khaṭīb return with rancour when he meets them (the Christians) and they withhold from him his due meed of respect².

If a man refrain from injuring me, then may (divine) bounty and mercy bless him as long as he lives!

Let him read the Book of Moses, if he will, or let him, if he likes, conceive in his heart devotion to Isaiah³.

After what we have seen of Ma'arri's views on the subject of religion it is evident that he would not be described accurately by any designation which connotes belief in a divine Word revealed through prophecy or in a religious code deriving its authority from tradition. His whole creed might be expressed in some such formula as "God, the Creator, is One: fear and obey Him⁴." The nearest Arabic equivalent to "deist" is zindīq; but this term is opprobrious and commonly associated with immorality, being applied by Moslems not only to deists, atheists, pantheists, and persons suspected of holding Zoroastrian or Manichæan doctrines, but also to all sorts of antinomian heretics. The poet brands with the name zindīq religious impostors whose tenets he considers false and irrational¹. Some of this class—possibly Carmathians—are addressed in the following lines.

(310)

Ye cast the creeds behind,
 Tho' nowhere do ye find
 In Wisdom they should be rejected and dismissed.
 Obedience ye refuse
 The Moslem judge, the Jews'
 Rabbi, the Christian bishop, and the Magian priest.
 Let your law be in turn
 Offered to them ye spurn,
 All will cry, "Nay; we don't desire it in the least²."

His own religion is founded on the authority of reason and fulfilled by the practice of virtue. Not a sanctified law, but an enlightened mind, distinguishes good from evil. "Serve God alone, without reference to His servants (creatures); for the law (of religion) makes us slaves, while (the use of) logical judgment makes us free³." True religion consists in righteousness together with justice and charity to all men⁴.

The one religion is that thou be just
 To all—and what religion owneth he
 That scorns due right?⁵

كُنْ عَابِدًا لِلَّهِ دُونَ عِبِيدِهِ * فَالْشَّرْعُ يُعْبَدُ وَالْقِيَاسُ يَحْرَرُ

⁴ Religion is also defined as "the voluntary abandonment of pleasures whilst one is healthy and capable of enjoying them" (I. 361, penult.); as "sincerity combined with innocence" (I. 438, 7); and as "kindness and gentleness" (II. 111, 6).

And beſt of all thy words, "To God the glory."¹

Like Socrates and the Greeks generally, he takes morality to be "rather a concern of the head than of the heart." The wickedneſs of human nature is repeatedly deſcribed as "ignorance" and "folly." There are two kinds of ignorance, he ſays, which bring men to perdition: one of theſe is conſtitutional, the other they learn from their preceptors². Virtue is the fruit of knowledge; the underſtanding, not the will, controls and corrects the impuſes of the fleſh³. In accordance with the view that evil needs only to be known in order to be ſhunned, the poet teaches moral truth by expoſing the univerſal falſehood of mankind for the ſake of the few who will liſten to reaſon and let themſelves be guided by it⁴. As we have ſeen, his ideal of virtue demands world-flight⁵, but on the other hand his ethical doctrine inculcates "as the higheſt and holieſt duty a conſcientious fulfilment of one's obligations . . . towards all living beings⁶."

(Metre: Basîf.)

(312)

Virtue is neither a faſt conſuming thoſe who it keep,
Nor any office of prayer nor rough fleece wrapped on the limbs.

What! ſeeſt thou not that vice in man's nature is inborn,
But virtue a new unheired poſſeſſion which minds acquire?

⁷ Luzûm, I. 285, 13.

The tired beast beyond its strength he burdens, and if it flag,
 He sets on it with his lash, whilst stubbornly it endures—
 Until it grows like unto a whoremonger, one unwed,
 On whom falls the penalty of scourging, and not by halves¹.
 Weals rise on its back and flanks, the visible marks of woe;
 Oh, pardon a helpless brute too feeble to plod along!
 A Maker have we: the mind, undoubting, confesses Him
 Eternal—then what avails this birth of a latter day?²
 And grant that you rub and rub the fire-stick of Right in vain,
 Still less from those sticks of Wrong can ever you coax a spark.
 It gladdens me not, that I inflict on a fellow-man
 Injustice, and live in ease and opulence all the while³.

(Metre: Basîf.)

(314)

Virtue is like unto twigs of 'arfaj sodden with rain:
 The shepherd sets them alight—they crackle, blaze, and expire;
 Vice like a fire of tough ghadâ wood kindled at night:
 A long while passes, and still its coals keep smouldering on.

* * * * *

I charge thee, draw not a sword for bloodshed: deem it enow
 That here the slaughterous blade of Time is ever unsheathed.
 A rumour ran in the world—I know it not as a fact—
 That certain men have reviled the One Upholder of all.
 What! laud a man, tho' his mind was turned not once in his days
 To noble haviour, and leave the Lord of good without laud!⁴

If in some passages Ma'arri allows that good works may earn the thawâb (recompense from God)⁵, his rational and philosophical judgment rejects a quid pro quo morality and declares that, as virtue is commonly its own reward in this world, it ought to be practised "because 'tis best and fairest⁶," without expectation of favours to come.

¹ An unmarried man who commits adultery is punished by the infliction of one hundred stripes, if he be free; but if he be a slave, the number of stripes is reduced by half.

When, having bestowed a boon, thou meet'st with ingratitude, Repine not, for He who keeps His word gives thee recompense².
 'Twere pity a gentleman should only do right in fear
 Of public disgrace, if men report him a wrong-doer.
 The good that thou dost, oh, far away from it put reward
 Expected or certain gain, as though thou wert huckstering!³

(Metre: Tawîl.)

(317)

Ay, oft-times a man hath been asleep to his doom, until Death came of a sudden to him, and he drowsing, half-awake.
 Whenever thou doest good, impute it with single mind
 To Allah, and spurn the tongues desirous of praising thee.
 Misfortune although it be to live in this world of ours,
 Consolment thou find'st in acts of virtue and charity⁴.

(318)

Forbidden is thy baser self to quit
 The body ere evil thou with good repay⁵.
 For God's, not men's sake give thy benefit,
 And from their eyes brush drowsiness away⁶.

"Be thou in purpose and deed a benefactor of men,
 Although they pay not again the debt of kindness to thee."

⁵ Cf., however, I. 422, 2: "Repel evil, when it comes, with evil, and be humble, for thou art only a man"; and II. 378, 1: "Do not repay evil with good, and if in any matter I fail to keep faith with thee, then do thou break faith with me."

⁶ Luzûm, II. 342, 2.

Ma'arrí especially enjoins forbearance, compassion, and kindness. A man should be lenient to others, but severe to himself¹. "Charity is the best of thy beliefs: be not heedless thereof, and thou mayst pray facing the Ka'ba (as Moslems do) or after the fashion of Zoroastrians²." "How is it that the rich do not share their abundance with the poor?³" The ways of true generosity are unknown to those who grudge their fellow-creatures what they bestow on their near relatives⁴. Injustice to the weak and helpless excites his indignation: he pities old men neglected by their sons⁵, and pleads for humane treatment of slaves⁶; but he is most deeply touched—this is an Indian trait—by wrong done to animals, birds, and insects⁷.

(319)

How for her dead should Earth have care,
When in the moment of despair
Men cast away their not yet dead
Uncared for and uncomforted?
If God please, when the burst tombs quake,
He'll punish them for what they did and spake⁸.

Not only does he abhor cruelty to animals in the modern sense of the phrase⁹, but he would protect them, if he could, from all injuries which human selfishness causes them to suffer.

(Metre: Basîṭ.)

Iniquity is innate: kinswomen taken in ward
Are wronged, and benefits hid, and scales to short measure run.

To let go from my hand a flea that I have caught is a kinder act than to bestow a dirhem on a man in need.

There is no difference between the black earless creature which I release and the Black Prince of Kinda who bound the tiara (on his head)³.

Both of them take precaution (against death); and life is dear to it (the flea), and it passionately desires the means of living⁴.

The poet speculates concerning the likelihood of a future existence in which innocent animals will enjoy the happiness denied them in this world⁵. Two of the Luzúmiyyát are addressed to birds—the ring-dove and the cock⁶—and another to the wolf, who “if he were conscious of his bloodguiltiness, would rather have remained unborn⁷.”

As I have shown above, Ma‘arrí put no trust in blood and iron as a cure for the woes of humanity⁸. War to his mind is immoral, irrational and futile⁹—for are not the living even

To being: the eternal stuff of Time is its pitchy dark².

The houses are plastered spick and span, while the tombs decay,
Albeit nor gate nor guard can fend off the stroke unseen.
They say that Islam shall be erased, even as of old
The faith Unitarian went forward and Persia fell;
But hap whatsoever may, yet Allah deceaseth not,
And men cull in days to come the fruitage of that they plant.
Methinks, in the last of life is wormwood that made thee then Forget what thou once wast fed withal by the humming bees.
Aloof from the yellow sun lodge him that the daybeams scorch,
And bid nigh the ruddy flame when icily breathes the night.
O king, sure in Hell's hot fire shall burn he that calls a folk
To prayer the while their blood dyes crimson his scimitar.
In Ramla, the dust-defiled, are striplings and grey-haired men
Sore-stricken with miseries because of the crime thou wrought'st⁴.

His views on education are conservative and almost patriarchal.

"Beat thy son and lead him into a right way of action, and do not say, 'He is a child not yet grown up.' A crack on the head is often beneficial: consider how good it is for the reed-pen to have its head split⁵."

Teach your girls to ply the loom and spindle,
 Reading and writing—leave it to their brothers!
 A maid's prayer giving unto God the glory
 Will serve instead of Yúnus and Bará'a¹.
 Well may she blush to sit before the curtain,
 Whene'er the singing-women sing behind it².

(327)

Do not think thy fair ones worthy of praise if they are found with hands that can form lines of writing,
 For it better becomes them to carry spindles than reeds made into pens.
 Girls are arrows: if they get acquainted with a book of grammar, they return envenomed with mischief.
 They leave the virtuous man infatuated, though they came (to him) as pupils, that he might guide them.
 And if they go to consult the astrologer, they do not draw back from error.
 Let them learn to read (the Koran) from an old crone—one of those who open toothless mouths, Glorifying the Lord every night and praying in the morning, ever abstaining from sin.
 When young women speak well enough to explain what they mean, they are not to be blamed for mispronunciation³.

Such maxims, though widely current, must have been deemed reactionary by many who read the Luzúm before the death of its author or soon afterwards⁴. They are based, no doubt, on the general Moslem view that the female sex is "deficient in intelligence and religion." Ma'arri's ideal of womanhood is the modest, hard-working, home-keeping wife,

¹ "Yúnus and Bará'a" refer to two chapters of the Koran, viz. the Súra of Yúnus or Jonah (ch. 10) and the Súra of Bará'a (ch. 9), which is so called from the initial word, bará'a (immunity). I am indebted to Mr Krenkow for explaining this allusion.

And meets with good in her putting evil afar³.

The practical moral excellence at which he aims is the result of right knowledge; and right knowledge cannot be gained by means of a liberal education. On the contrary, "people everywhere are called to embrace false doctrines by a party of *udabá*⁴," i.e. men of letters and culture. Reason is the guide to virtue, and asceticism is the road. He scorns the argument from antiquity.

Allege not, when thou work'st a deed of shame,
The scoundrel's plea, "My forbears did the same."⁵

Ma'arri has been dubbed "a precursor of Omar Khayyám⁶," an unfortunate and misleading phrase which can only be defended by the plea that FitzGerald does not give a true picture of the Persian astronomer⁷. Omar, certainly, was a pessimist and sceptic, but (according to FitzGerald) he had also a marked vein of hedonism and mysticism, of which no vestige is to be found in the Luzúmiyyát. M. Salmon speaks of "les éloges qu'Al-Ma'arri, habitué à des fréquentations de buveurs, prodigue à la liqueur vermeille⁸"; these, however, are quite imaginary, for he always refers to wine-drinking with reprobation⁹. Granted that Omar may have been more like Ma'arrí than we should suppose from the English representation of him, trustworthy evidence concerning his character is too slight to allow the two poets to be compared. All we can say is that their philosophies of life have some features in common, and that several passages in the Luzúm at once call to mind well-known "Omarian" stanzas, for example:

God moulded me of water (seed), and lo, like water I run by measure according as I was set to run.

I was created for the divine purpose without knowing the realities thereof, and would that I were absolved from the reckoning with God!

I see the apparition of a curtain which Destiny pre-ordained, whence I came forth for a little and then was hidden in darkness¹.

Ma'arrí, too, strikes from the calendar

"Unborn To-morrow and dead Yesterday," but not in the sense of carpe diem; for when he says,

"Lay your hands now to that in which we are engaged, and leave alone To-morrow, for it is not yet come, and Yesterday, for it is past²,"

he warns us that to live righteously is a present and urgent duty. His pessimism is no mood of melancholy retrospect, it is the cry of a man in pain who feels himself driven along ruthlessly, "like victims with halters on their necks³."

(330)

We were created for some end unclear: we live a little while, then destruction o'ertakes us.

We are like foodless horses, ever champing their bits in wrath, for their side-teeth are bloody with champing⁴.

Although, as an ascetic, he must confess and preach the vanity of fame¹, he alludes to his literary reputation and anticipates that it will outlast him.

(331)

Well-pleased awhile I gathered lore, till Time Filled me with rage and memory I did lack.
Whatever I indite in prose or rhyme,
The plagiarists are on my phrases' track².

Man's harmony, composed of discords four,
To Seven of diverse influence is made o'er³.
Read thou my poesy, when earth shall bind me;
For lo, I leave it as an heir behind me⁴.

In another passage he tells how he was dreamed of—and in the dreamer's vision he was a great king, his head crowned with a tiara of gold. "I said, interpreting it, 'Gold (dhahab) is a sign of my decease (dhahābī), and the tiara signifies my renown when I shall be dust.'⁵"

- B The Bombay edition of the Luzûm (A.H. 1303). It is based on a manuscript dated A.H. 639, which was transcribed for the Ḥafṣite prince, Abū Zakariyyā ibn Abī Ḥafṣ.
- C The Cairo edition (A.D. 1891), derived from a manuscript dated A.H. 633.
- L A copy, made for Von Kremer, of the Cairo MS. which is the source of the Bombay edition. It is now in the British Museum (Or. 3160, No. 1050 in Rieu's supplementary Catalogue). Von Kremer refers to it as Cod. K (Zeitschrift d. Deutschen Morg. Gesellschaft, 38, 501, note 1).
- O A manuscript in the Bodleian Library (No. 1293 in Uri's Catalogue). Though it is carelessly written, its original (dated A.H. 517) is more than a century older than the codices used by the Oriental editors.
- S The extracts from the Luzûm which were published by Von Kremer in the Sitzungsberichte d. Kais. Akad. zu Wien, vol. 117 (1889).
- Z The texts with German translation published by Von Kremer in the Zeitschrift d. Deutschen Morg. Gesellschaft, vols. 29, 30, 31 and 38.

The following text is that of C, collated throughout with BSZ and also, for the greater part, with LO. I have recorded nearly all the variants: it will be seen that these are few and as a rule unimportant. References showing where each extract occurs in C will be found under the English translations.

أَرَى اللَّبَّ مِرَّةَ اللَّيْبِ وَمَنْ يَكُنْ * مَرَّائِيهِ الْإِخْوَانُ يُصَدِّقُ وَيُكَذِّبُ
 أَخْشَى عَذَابَ اللَّهِ وَاللَّهُ عَادِلٌ * وقد عَشْتُ عَيْشَ الْمُسْتَضَامِ الْمَعَذَّبِ
 نَعَمْ إِنَّهَا الْأَرْزَاقُ وَالْمَرْءُ جَاهِلٌ * يُهْدَبُ مِنْ دُنْيَاهُ مَا لَمْ يُهْدَبْ

(I3)

ما بَاخْتِيَارِى مِيلَادِى وَلَا هَرَمِى * ولا حَيَاتِى فَهَلْ لى بَعْدُ تَخْيِيرُ
 ولا إِقَامَةً إِلَّا عَنْ يَدَى قَدْرِ * ولا مَسِيرَ إِذَا لَمْ يُقْضَ تَسْيِيرُ
 زَعِمْتَ أَنَّكَ تَهْدِينِى لَوَاضِحَةٍ * كَذَبْتَ هَذَا الَّذِى تَحْكِيهِ تَخْيِيرُ
 غَيَّرْتَ أَمْرًا فَهَلْ غَيَّرْتَ مُنْكَرَهُ * امْ لَيْسَ عِنْدَكَ لِلتَّكْرَارِ تَغْيِيرُ

(14)

وَسِرْتُ عُمَرَى إِلَى قَبْرِى عَلَى مَهْلٍ * وَقَدْ دَنَوْتُ فَحَقَّ الْخَوْفُ وَالْهَلَعُ
مَا نَحْنُ أَمَّ مَا بَرَايَا عَالِمٍ كُنُورٍ * فِى قُدْرَةِ بَعْضِهَا الْإِفْلَاقُ يَبْتَلَعُ
تَهَزَّمُ الرُّعْدُ حَتَّى خِلْتُهُ أَسَدًا * أَمَامَهُ مِنْ بُرُوقِ النَّسْنَسَنِ دُلُوعُ

(15)

خَلَّ الزَّمَانَ وَأَهْلِيهِ لِشَأْنِهِمْ * وَعِشْ بِدَهْرِكَ وَالْأَقْوَامِ مُرْتَابَا
سَارَ الشَّبَابُ فَلَمْ نَعْرِفْ لَهُ خَبْرًا * وَلَا رَأَيْنَا خَيَالًا مِنْهُ مُنْتَابَا
وَحَقُّ لِلْعَيْسِ لَوْ نَالَتْ بِنَا بَلَدًا * فِيهِ الصَّبَا كَوْنُ عَوْدِ الْهِنْدِ أَقْتَابَا
ه أَلْقَى الْكَبِيرُ قَمِيصَ الشَّرْخِ رَهْنًا بِلَى * ثُمَّ اسْتَجَدَّ قَمِيصَ الشَّيْبِ مُجْتَابَا
مَا زَالَ يَمُطِّلُ دُنْيَاهُ بِتَوْبَتِهِ * حَتَّى أَتَتْهُ مَنَايَاهُ وَمَا تَابَا
خَطُّ اسْتَوَاءٍ بَدَأَ عَنْ نَقْطَةِ عَجَبٍ * أَفْنَتْ خُطُوطًا وَأَقْلَامًا وَكُتَابَا

مَا أَجْهَلَ الْأُمَمَ الَّذِينَ عَرَفْتَهُمْ * وَلَعَلَّ سَالِفَهُمْ أَضَلُّ وَأَتَبَرُ
يَدْعُونَ فِى جُمُعَاتِهِمْ بِسَفَاهَةٍ * لِأُمِيرِهِمْ فَيَكَادُ يَبْكِي الْهِنْبَرُ
جِئْنَا عَلَى كَرِّهِ وَنَرَحُلُ رَغَمًا * وَلَعَلَّنَا مَا بَيْنَ ذَلِكَ نُجْبَرُ
مَا قِيلَ فِى عِظَمِ الْهَلِكِ وَعِزِّهِ * فَالِلْهُ أَعْظَمُ فِى الْقِيَاسِ وَأَكْبَرُ
ه وَكَأَنَّمَا دُنْيَاكَ رُؤْيَا نَائِمٍ * بِالْعَكْسِ فِى عُقْبَى الزَّمَانِ تَعَبَرُ
فَإِذَا بِكَيْتَ بِهَا فَتِلْكَ مَسْرَّةٌ * وَإِذَا ضَحِكْتَ فَذَاكَ عَيْنٌ تَعَبَرُ
سَرَّ الْفَتَى مِنْ جَهْلِهِ بِزَمَانِهِ * وَهُوَ الْأَسِيرُ لِيَوْمٍ قَتْلٍ يُصْبَرُ

ما يفتأ المرء والأبراد يخلقها * باللبس عصراً الى أن يلبس الكبراً
وذاك بُردٌ اذا ما أجتأبه رجلٌ * ألقى الحبورَ وألقى بالفم الحبراً
يا ساكني الارض كم ركب سألهم * بما فعلتم فلم أعرف لكم خبراً
زالت خطوبٌ فلم تذكر شداؤها * والعود ينسى اذا ما أعفى الدبرا

* * *

ه أما رأيت فقيه المِصر أقبل من * دُفن الصديق فلم يوعظ بمن قبرا
أنت ابن وقتك والماضي حديث كرى * ولا حلاوة للباقي الذي غبرا

(67)

لقد مات جنى الصبى منذ بُرهة * وتأبى عفارى القلب غير مُرود
أمرت وأمرت أم دفر وإن حلت * فكم حلاّت قوماً غداة وُرود
شربتُ بروداً لم يدع نار غلة * وعن منكبى ألقىت خير برود

(68)

والناس كالنار كانوا فى نشاءتهم * يستضوا السقط منها ثم ينتشر
والارض تئبت من نخل ومن عثر * وما يخلد لا نخل ولا عثر
لو يعقلون لهنوا أهل ميمهم * ولم تقم لوليد فيهم البشر

(69)

سَلُوا مَعَشَرَ الْمَوْتَى الذى جاءَ وافداً * اليكم يخبرُ فهو أَقربكم عهداً
يحدّثكم أنّ البلاد مقيمة * على ما عهدتم ذلك الهضب والوهدا
ولم تفتأ الدنيا تغرّ خليلها * وتبدله من غمض أجفانه شهدا
تُريه الدجى فى هيئة النور خدعةً * وتطعمه صاباً فيحبسه شهدا
ه وقد حملته فوق نعش وطال ما * سرى فوق عس او علا قرساً نهدا
ولم تترك من حيلة لتغره * ولم يبق فى إخلاصه حباً جهدا

كره الجهولُ بناتِهِ وسليهُ * أجنى لما يغتاله من صهره
ه أَعَدَى عدوّ لابنِ آدمَ خِلْتَهُ * ولدٌ يكونُ خروجهُ من ظهره
وسفاهةُ الانسانِ مُوهمةٌ له * بدّ القوارحِ فى الرّهانِ بمهره

انّ الطبيبَ وذا التنجيمِ ما فتّا * مشهريّنِ بتقويمِ وكُنّاشِ
يعلّانِ وفى التعليلِ مأرَبَةٌ * ويستميلانِ قلبَ المُتَرَفِ الناشِ

(I35)

قطعتَ البلادَ فمن صاعدٍ * بغِيثِ النّوالِ ومن هابطِ
تمدُّ عصاك الى النابحاتِ * فيعجبُنَ من جأشك الرابِطِ
وتغبطُ كلاً على ما حواه * وما لك فى العيشِ من غابِطِ
وقفتَ على كلّ بابٍ رأيتُ حتّى نهاك أبو ضابطِ

تَقْوَى فِيهِدَى الْيَكِ الزَّادُ عَنْ عُرْضٍ * وَتَقْتَرَى الْاَرْضَ جَوًّا فَتَقْتَرِفُ
تَرَوْمُ رِزْقًا بَأْنَ سَمُوكَ مَتَّكِلًا * وَأَدِينُ النَّاسِ مِنْ يَسْعَى وَيَحْتَرِفُ
يَكْفِيكَ أَدَمًا بَنَحْضٍ مَاءُ نَابِتَةٍ * وَظَلَمَكَ النَّحْلُ مَا يُعْطِيكَهُ الضَّرْفُ

(I37)

أَوْقَدْتَ نَارًا بِأَفْتِكَارِكَ أَظْهَرْتُ * نَهَجًا وَأَنْتَ عَلَى سَنَاهَا عَاشِي
مَتَكِسِّينَ وَمَسْجِمٍ وَمَعَزَمٍ * وَجَمِيعُ ذَاكَ تَحِيلٌ لِمَعَاشِ
قَدْ أُرْعَشْتُ يَدُ سَائِلٍ مِنْ كِبَرَةٍ * وَلِنَائِلٍ بُسِطَتْ عَلَى الْإِرْعَاشِ

(I38)

بَنَى الْآدَابِ غَرَّتْكُمْ قَدِيمًا * زَخَارُفٌ مِثْلُ زَمْزَمَةِ الذُّبَابِ
وَمَا شُعْرَاءُكُمْ إِلَّا ذُنَابٌ * تَلَصَّصُ فِي الْمَدَائِحِ وَالشَّبَابِ
أَضْرَلْهُنَّ تَوَدُّ مِنَ الْأَعَادِي * وَأَسْرَقُ لِلْمَقَالِ مِنَ الزُّبَابِ
أُقَارِضُكُمْ ثَنَاءً غَيْرَ حَقٍّ * كَأَنَّا مِنْهُ فِي مَجْرَى سِبَابِ
هَ أَذْهَبُ فِيكُمْ إِيَّامَ شَيْبَى * كَمَا أَذْهَبَتْ إِيَّامَ الشَّبَابِ
* * *

وَأَلْقَيْتُ الْفَصَاحَةَ عَنْ لِسَانِي * مَسْلَمَةً إِلَى الْعَرَبِ اللَّبَابِ
شُغُولٌ يَنْقُضِينَ بِغَيْرِ حَمْدٍ * وَلَا يَرْجِعْنَ إِلَّا بِالشَّبَابِ
ذَرُونِي يَفْقِدِ الْهَدْيَانِ لَفْظِي * وَأُغْلِقُ لِلْحِمَامِ عَلَى بَابِي

(I39)

عَشْ بِخِيلًا كَأَهْلٍ عَصْرِكَ هَذَا * وَتَبَالَهُ فَإِنَّ دَهْرَكَ أَبْلَهُ
قَوْمُ سَوْءٍ فَالْتَبَلُ مِنْهُمْ يَغُولُ * السَّلْمِيَّتُ قَرَأَ وَاللَيْثُ يَأْكُلُ شِبْلَهُ
إِنْ تُرِدْ أَنْ تَخْصَّ حُرًّا مِنَ النَّاسِ بِخَيْرٍ فَخْصْ نَفْسَكَ قَبْلَهُ

(I40)

كُفَى دُمُوعِكَ لِلتَّفَرُّقِ وَأَطْلُبِي * دَمْعًا يَبَارِكُ مِثْلَ دَمْعِ الزَّاهِدِ
فَبِقَطْرَةٍ مِنْهُ تَبُوحُ جَهَنَّمُ * فِيمَا يُقَالُ حَدِيثٌ غَيْرُ مُشَاهِدِ
خَافِي إِلَهِكَ وَأَحْذَرِي مِنْ أُمَّةٍ * لَمْ يَلْبَسُوا فِي الدِّينِ ثَوْبَ مُجَاهِدِ
أَكَلُوا فَأَفْنَوْا ثُمَّ غَنَوْا وَاتَّشَوْا * فِي رُقُصِهِمْ وَتَمَتَّعُوا بِالشَّاهِدِ
هَ حَالَتِ عُهْدُ الْخَلْقِ كَمَنْ مُسْلِمٍ * أَمْسَى يَرُومُ شِفَاعَةً بِمُعَاهِدِ
وَهُوَ الزَّمَانُ قَضَى بِغَيْرِ تَنَاصُفٍ * بَيْنَ الْأَنَامِ وَضَاعَ جَهْدُ الْجَاهِدِ
سَهْدَ الْغَتَى لِمَطَالِبٍ مَا نَالَهَا * وَأَصَابَهَا مِنْ بَاتٍ لَيْسَ بِسَاهِدِ

لَهْفَى عَلَى لَيْلَةٍ وَيَوْمٍ * تَأَلَّفَتْ مِنْهُمَا الشُّهُورُ
وَالْغِيَا عُنْصُرَى زَمَانٍ * لَبَسَ لِأَسْرَارِهِ ظُهُورُ
قَدْ أَصْبَحَ الدِّينُ مَضْمَحَلًّا * وَغَيَّرَتْ آيَةَ الدُّهُورُ
فَلَا زَكَاةَ وَلَا صِيَامَ * وَلَا صَلَاةَ وَلَا طَهُورُ
هَ وَاعْتَاضَ حِلَّ النِّكَاحِ قَوْمٌ * بِنِسْوَةٍ مَا لَهَا مُهْوَرُ

عصا في يد الأعمى يروم بها الهدى * أبر له من كل خدين وصاحب
فأوسع بنى حواء هجرا فاتهم * يسرون في نهج من الغدر لاجب
وإن غير الإثم الوجوه فما ترى * لدى الحشر إلا كل أسود شاحب
إذا ما اشار العقل بالرشد جرهم * الى الغي طبع أخذه أخذ صاحب

(I46)

لو يفهم الناس ما أبنائهم جلب * وبيع بالفلس ألف منهم كسدوا
فويحهم بس ما ربوا وما حزنوا * فهي الخديعة والأضغان والحسد

رأيت قضاء الله أوجب خلقه * وعاد عليهم في تصرفه سلبا
وقد غلب الأحياء في كل وجهة * هواهم وإن كانوا غطافة غلبا
كلاب تغاوت أو تعاوت لجيفة * وأحسبني أصبحت الأمها كلبا
أبيننا سوى غش الصدور وانما * ينال ثواب الله أسلمنا قلبا

إذا حان يومي فلأوسد بموضع * من الارض لم يحفر به أحد قبرا
 هم الناس إن جازاهم الله بالذى * توخوه لم يرهم جهولا ولا خبرا
 يرى عنتا في قرب حي وميت * من الإنس من حلى سرائرهم خبرا
 فيا ليتنى لا أشهد الحشر فيهم * إذا بعثوا شعنا رؤوسهم غربا
 ٥ إذا تم فيما تؤنس العين مضجعى * فزدنى هداك الله من سعة شبرا
 وإن سألو عن مذهبي فهو خشيعة * من الله لا طوقا أبث ولا جبرا

عمى العين يتلوه عمى الدين والهدى * فليلتى القصوى ثلاث ليالى
 وما أزممت نفسى البنان على آلتى * إذا أزممت عصت بشوك سبال
 ولا قصرت لى أمر ليلى بشربها * حنادس اوقات على طيال
 إذا ما اجتمعنا هاجت الحزن ألفة * محدثة عن جمعنا بزبال

وَمَهْمَا يَكُنْ فَالِدُهُ لَيْسَ بِزَائِلٍ * وَيَجْنِي الْفَتَى مِنْ بَعْدِ مَا هُوَ غَارِسُ
أَرَى مَقْرًا فِي آخِرِ الْعَيْشِ كَائِنًا * نَسِيَتْ لَهُ مَا أَطْعَمْتُكَ الْجَوَارِسُ
هَ فَابْعِدْ مِنَ الصَّفَرَاءِ وَالْيَوْمُ وَاقْدُ * وَأَدْنِ مِنَ الشَّقَرَاءِ وَاللَّيْلِ قَارِسُ
أَيَا قَيْلٍ إِنَّ النَّارَ صَالٍ بِحَرِّهَا * مُقِيمٌ صَلَاةٍ وَالْمَهْنَدُ وَارِسُ
وَبِالْزَمْلَةِ الشَّعْتَاءِ شَيْبٌ وَوِلْدَةٌ * أَصَابَهُمْ مِمَّا جَنَيْتَ الدَّهَارِسُ

(326)

عَلِّمُوهُنَّ الْغَزَلَ وَالنَّسَجَ وَالرَّدْنَ وَخَلُّوا كِتَابَهُ وَقِرَاءَهُ
فَصَلَاةَ الْفَتَاةِ بِالْحَمْدِ وَالْإِخْلَاصِ تَجْزَى عَنْ يُونُسَ وَبِرَاءَهُ
تَهْتِكُ السِّتْرَ بِالْجُلُوسِ أَمَامَ السِّتْرِ إِنْ غَنَّتِ الْقِيَانُ وَرَأَاهُ

(327)

وَلَا تَحْمَدِ حِسَانَكَ إِنْ تَوَافَتْ * بَأْيِدِ السُّطُورِ مُقَوِّمَاتِ
فَحَمَلُ مَغَازِلِ النَّسْوَانِ أَوْلَى * بِهِنَّ مِنَ الْيَرَاعِ مَقْلَمَاتِ
سِهَامُ إِنْ عَرَفْنَ كِتَابَ لِسْنِ * رَجَعْنَ بِمَا يَسُوهُ مُسَمَّاتِ
وَيَتْرَكْنَ اللَّيْبَ بِغَيْرِ لُبٍّ * أَتَيْنَ لِهَدْيِهِ مُتَعَلِّمَاتِ
هـ وَإِنْ جِئْنَ الْمَنْجَمَ سَائِلَاتِ * فَلَسْنَ عَنِ الضَّلَالِ بِمُنْجِمَاتِ
لِيَأْخُذْنَ التَّلَاوَةَ عَنْ عَجُوزِ * مِنَ اللَّائِي فَعَرْنَ مُهْتِمَاتِ
يُسَبِّحْنَ الْمَلِيكَ بِكُلِّ جُنْحٍ * وَيَرْكَعْنَ الضُّحَى مُتَأْتِمَاتِ
فَمَا عَيْبٌ عَلَى الْفَتَيَاتِ لَحْنٌ * إِذَا قُلْنَ الْمُرَادَ مُتَرْجِمَاتِ

(328)

قَدْ حَاطَتْ الزَّوْجَ حُرَّةٌ سَأَلَتْ * مَلِيكَهَا الْعَوْنَ فِي حِيَاطِهَا
عَدَتْ بِبِرْسٍ إِلَى مَرَادِنِهَا * أَوْ خَيطِ غَزَلٍ إِلَى خِيَاطِهَا
أَمَاطَتْ الشَّوْءَ عَنْ ضَمَائِرِهَا * فَلَاقَتْ الْخَيْرَ فِي إِمَاطِهَا

(329)

وَصَاحَنِي اللَّهُ مِنْ مَاءٍ وَهَا أَنَا ذَا * كَالْمَاءِ أَجْرَى بِقَدْرِ كَيْفِ جُرَيْتِ
بُرَيْتِ لِلْأَمْرِ لَمْ أَعْرِفْ حَقَائِقَهُ * فَلَيْتَنِي مِنْ حِسَابِ اللَّهِ بُرَيْتِ
أَرَى خَيَالٍ إِذَا رَ حَمَّهُ قَدَّرَ * ظَهَرَتْ مِنْهُ قَلِيلًا ثُمَّ وَرَيْتِ

327. ٣ BCL سهام. This reading, which I have followed in the translation, is inferior to that of O.

(330)

خُلِقْنَا لَشَيْءٍ غَيْرِ بَادٍ وَآتَمَّا * نَعِيشُ قَلِيلًا ثُمَّ يُدْرِكُنَا الْهَلْكَ
كَخَيْلٍ صِيَامٍ تَأْكُلُ الدَّهْرَ لُجْمَهَا * بَغِيطٍ فَقَدَ أَدَمَى نَوَاجِذَهَا الْإِلَّكَ

(331)

رَضِيتُ مَلَاوَةً فَوَعِيتُ عِلْمًا * وَأَحْفَظُنِي الزَّمَانُ فَقَلَّ حِفْظِي
إِذَا مَا قُلْتُ نَثْرًا أَوْ نَظِيمًا * تَتَبَّعَ سَارِقُو الْأَلْفَافِ لَفْظِي

(332)

وَالنَّاسُ مِنْ أَرْبَعٍ شَتَّى إِذَا اتَّخَلَفْتُ * رُدَّتْ إِلَى سَبْعَةٍ فِي الْحُكْمِ تَخْتَلِفُ
إِقْرَأْ كَلَامِي إِذَا ضَمَّ التَّرَى جَسَدِي * فَاتَهُ لَكَ مِمَّنْ قَالَهُ خَلْفُ
